teething (tē′ŦHing), n. [Verbal n. of teethe, v.] Dentition; the growth or formation of teeth; the act or process of acquiring teeth, as when they cut the gums.—Climacteric teething. See climacteric.

teetotal (tē′tō′tal), a. [An emphatic reduplication of total. There are two accounts of the origin of this word. (a) The Rev. Joel Jewell (according to various accounts, confirmed by a letter from him to the editor of this dictionary), secretary of a temperance society formed at Hector, New York, in 1818, on the basis of a pledge to abstain from distilled spirits but not from fermented liquors, introduced in January, 1827, a pledge binding the signers to abstinence from all intoxicants. The two classes of signers were distinguished as those who took the "old pledge," and had "O. P." placed before their names, and those who took the "new" or "total pledge" ("T."); the frequent explanation given of these letters made "T.—total" familiar. (b) Richard Turner, an artisan of Preston, in Lancashire, England, is said, in advocating the principle of temperance, about 1833, to have maintained that "nothing but te-te-total will do"; while a variation of this account makes the artisan a stutterer. Both accounts appear to be correct, and the word may have originated independently in the two countries.] 1. Total; complete; entire: used emphatically.—2. Of, pertaining to, or for the promotion of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors: as, a teetotal society, meeting, or pledge; the teetotal cause.

The teetotal movement had been founded some years earlier by the Quakers of Cork, but it took no hold on the people till Theobald Mathew, a young Capuchin friar, joined it in 1838.
W. S. Gregg, Irish Hist. for Eng. Readers, p. 143.

3. Pledged to total abstinence from intoxicating liquors. [Colloq.]

> I walk, I believe, 100 miles every week, and that I couldn't do, I know, if I wasn't teetotal.
> Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 403.

teetotaler, teetotaller (tē′tō′tal-ėr), n. [< teetotal + -er[1].] One who more or less formally pledges or binds himself to entire abstinence from intoxicating liquors, unless medically prescribed; a total abstainer.

> But I am a teetotaller—said the divinity-student in a subdued tone. O. W. Holmes, Professor, vi.

teetotalism (tē′tō′tal-izm), n. [< teetotal + -ism.] The principles or practice of teetotalers; total abstinence from intoxicating drink, or the total-abstinence movement.

After a period distinguished by hard drinking and hard eating has come a period of comparative sobriety, which, in teetotalism and vegetarianism, exhibits extreme forms of its protest against the riotous living of the past.
H. Spencer, Education, p. 225.

teetotally (tē′tō′tal-i), adv. Totally; entirely: used emphatically. [Colloq.]

> Dinner was an ugly little parenthesis between two still uglier clauses of a teetotally ugly sentence.
> De Quincey, Dinner, Real and Reputed.

In Sir James Spence's "Tour of Ireland," published in 1829, he speaks of the word teetotally as an adverb in every-day use by the working classes.
Edwards, Words, Facts, and Phrases, p. 561.

tee-totum (tē′tō′tum), n. [Also te-totum; i. e., T-totum, totum represented by T, from the T marked upon it.] 1. A small four-sided toy of the top kind, used by children in a very old game of chance. Formerly the four sides exhibited respectively the letters A, T, N, D. The toy is set spinning, and wins and losses are determined according to the letter that turns up when the tee-totum has ceased whirling: thus, A (Latin aufer, take away) indicates that the player who has last spun is entitled to take one from the stakes; D (depone, put down), a forfeiture or laying down of a stake; N (nihil, nothing), neither loss nor gain; T (totum, the whole) wins the whole of the stakes. In the modern tee-totum the D is commonly changed to P, and the reading also changed into English: thus, T (take up), P (put down), A (all), N (none).

The usage of the te-totum may be considered as a kind of petty gambling, it being marked with a certain number of letters; and part of the stake is taken up, or an additional part put down, according as those letters lie uppermost. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 492.

2. A similar toy used for spinning in the same manner, but circular or having an indefinite number of sides, and without the marks above described: used as a plaything or in different games by children.

tee-wheep (tē-hwēp′), n. [Imitative.] Same as pewit (b). See cut under lapwing. [Local, British.]

te-fall (tē′fâl), n. Same as to-fall. [Prov. Eng. or Scotch.]

teff (tef), n. [Native name; also written taff, thaff, theff.] An annual cereal grass, Eragrostis Abyssinica, the most important food-plant of Abyssinia. Its grains, which are of the size of a pinhead, afford a very white flour which makes an excellent bread of an agreeable acidulous taste.

teft† (teft), a. [A var. of tight (ME. teght, tight*); cf. draft, var. of draught, dafter, a dial. var. of daughter, etc.: see tight, taut.] Tight; taut.

> Away they fly, their tackling teft and tight, > Top and top-gallant in the bravest sort.

teind (tēnd), n. [< Icel. tiund, a tenth, a tithe: see tenth, tithe.] In Scotland, a tithe. It is paid from the produce of land or cattle only. After the Reformation the whole teinds of Scotland were transferred to the crown, or to private individuals called titulars, to whom they had been granted by the crown, or to feuars or renters from the church, or to the original founding patrons, or to colleges or pious institutions. By a succession of decrees and enactments these tithes were generally rendered redeemable at a fixed valuation, but the clergy have now no right to the teinds beyond a suitable provision, called a stipend; so that teinds may now be described as that part of the estates of the laity which is liable to be assessed for the stipend of the clergy of the established church.

> At every seven years
> They pay the teind to hell;
> And I am sae fat and fair of flesh,
> I fear 'twill be mysell.

Court of Teinds (in full, Court of Lords Commissioners for Teinds), a court in Scotland consisting of five judges of the Court of Session (four lords of the inner house and the lord ordinary on teinds), who sit as a parliamentary commission, with jurisdiction extending to all matters respecting valuations and sales of teinds, augmentations of stipends, the disjunction or annexation of parishes, etc.—Decree of valuation of teinds. See decree.

teind-master (tēnd'mās'tėr), n. In Scotland, one who is entitled to teinds.

teinet, n. See tain.

tein-land (tēn'land), n. Thane-land. See thane.

teinoscope (tī'nō-skōp), n. [< Gr. τείνειν (see tend[1]), stretch, extend, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An optical instrument invented by Sir David Brewster, consisting of two prisms so combined as to correct the chromatic aberration, while the dimensions of objects seen through them are increased or decreased in the plane of refraction. Amici's prism-telescope consists of two such teinoscopes arranged consecutively, with their planes of refraction perpendicular to each other.

teknonymous (tek-non'i-mus), a. [< Gr. τέκνον, child, + ὄνομα, ὄνυμα, name.] Pertaining to or characterized by teknonymy.

Let us now turn to another custom, not less quaint-seeming than the last to the European mind. This is the practice of naming the parent from the child. . . . There are above thirty peoples spread over the earth who thus name the father, and, though less often, the mother. They may be called, coining a name for them, teknonymous peoples. Jour. Anthrop. Inst., XVIII. 248.

teknonymy (tek-non'i-mi), n. [< teknonym-ous + -y[3].] The naming of a parent from his or her child.

Another custom, here called teknonymy, or naming the parent from the child, prevails among more than thirty peoples. Athenæum, No. 3188, p. 740.

tel (tel), n. Sesame. See til.

tela (tē'lä), n.; pl. telæ (-lē). [NL., < L. tela, web, warp: see toil[2].] 1. A web; a rete.—2. In anat.: (a) A tissue, in general; any tissue of the body, or histological structure, as distinguished from the structures or organs of gross anatomy: extended to include liquids containing corpuscles: as, tela adiposa, fatty tissue; tela connectiva, connective tissue; tela lymphatica, liquid contents of the body-cavity and lymphatic vessels. Haeckel. (b) A delicate membranous web or thin sheet of scarcely nervous tissue found in the brain in connection with its cavities, consisting both of pia mater and of endyma, with little or no nerve-tissue intervening.—Tela aranea. Same as spider-web.—Tela cellulosa, areolar tissue.—Tela choroidea cerebelli, the membranous roof of the lower section of the fourth ventricle, continuous above with the velum medullare posterius. Also called tela choroidea inferior ventriculi quarti.—Tela choroidea superior, the velum interpositum, or membranous roof of the third ventricle. Also called velum triangulare.

telæsthesia (tel-es-thē'si-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. τῆλε, afar, + αἴσθησις, perception.] Perception at a distance. See the quotation under telepathy.

telamon (tel'a-mon), n.; pl. telamones (tel-a-mō'nēz). [< L. telamon, telamo, < Gr. τελαμών, bearer, < τλῆναι, bear.] In arch., the figure of a man performing the function of a column or pilaster to support an entablature, in the same manner as a caryatid. They were called atlantes by the Greeks. See atlantes.

telangiectasia (te-lan″ji-ek-tā'si-ä), n. [NL., also telangiectasis, < Gr. τέλος, the end, + ἀγγεῖον, vessel, + ἔκτασις, extension.] In med., a dilatation of the small vessels.

telangiectasis (te-lan-ji-ek'tā-sis), n. [NL.: see telangiectasia.] Same as telangiectasia.

telangiectasy (te-lan-ji-ek'tā-si), n. [< NL. telangiectasia.] Same as telangiectasia.

telangiectatic (te-lan″ji-ek-tat'ik), a. Pertaining to or exhibiting telangiectasia.

telapoint, n. An obsolete form of talapoin. Imp. Dict.

telar[1] (tē'lär), a. [< tela + -ar[3].] Having the character of a tela, web, or tissue; telary: as, the telar membranes of the brain. See tela.

II. n. A spinning spider.

telarly† (tē'lär-li), adv. [< telar (cf. telary) + -ly[2].] In the manner of or so as to make a web or tela: as, "telarly interwoven," Sir T. Browne.

telary (tel'a-ri), a. [< ML. telarius,* < L. tela, a web: see tela.] 1. Of or pertaining to a web, tissue, or tela; woven; spun.—2†. Spinning a web, as a spider; telarian.

The picture of telary spiders, and their position in the web, is commonly made lateral, and regarding the horizon. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 19. (Richardson.) telautograph (te-lâ'tō-graf), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + αὐτός, self, + γράφειν, write.] The name given by Elisha Gray to his form of writing- or copying-telegraph. This telegraph can be used to reproduce in facsimile either the handwriting of the person sending the message, or any picture or drawing which can be made with a pen. The transmitting-pen is connected by cords to mechanism by means of which the motions of the pen cause a pulsatory current to pass into two telegraph-line wires. These pulsatory currents produce rapid pulsatory motion of the armatures of a system of electromagnets, by means of which the receiving-pen is caused to follow the motionsof the transmitter. Another electromagnetic arrangement lifts the receiving-pen off the paper at the end of each word or line, and still another serves to move the paper forward for the next line.

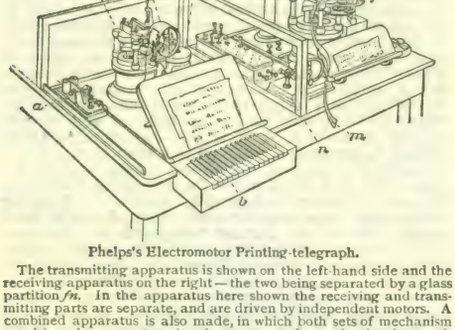
telegraph (tel′ē-grȧf), n. [= F. télégraphe = Sp. telégrafo = Pg. telegrapho = It. telegrafo = D. telegraaf = G. telegraph = Sw. Dan. telegraf = Russ. telegrafŭ = NGr. τηλέγραφος (all after E.), < Gr. τῆλε, afar, + γράφειν, write.] 1. An apparatus for transmitting intelligible messages to a distance. In this general sense it includes the original semaphore-telegraphs; mechanical telegraphs for sending messages short distances, as from the pilot-house to the engine-room of a steamer; pneumatic telegraphs, in which compressed air in a tube serves to transmit a message; hydraulic telegraphs, in which a column of water takes the place of the air in the tube; flashing lights, as from a heliotrope, and any appliance for signaling, as flags or lanterns. Nearly all of these appliances are recognized as signaling apparatus, and are now so called. (See signal and annunciator.) In its later and more restricted sense, the name is applied to some form of apparatus employing electricity and transmitting more than mere calls or signals. Telegraphs may be divided into two classes: the electromechanical telegraphs, or those in which the messages are received by means of some mechanical device operated by electricity; and the electrochemical telegraphs, in which the message is received and recorded by means of some chemical effect produced by electricity, the messages in both systems being sent or transmitted by some mechanical means. The electromechanical telegraphs may be again divided into two classes: those in which the message is received or read by sight (including those in which it is printed or recorded), and those in which it is read by sound. The electromechanical telegraphs are in some instances actuated by means of an electromagnet, and for this reason they are called electromagnetic telegraphs. This name has sometimes been given to all electrodynamic telegraphs, but it appears properly to belong to the electromechanical telegraphs which employ electromagnetism, and particularly to the Morse system. There is also an electromechanical telegraph actuated by magneto-electricity, and called the magneto-electric telegraph. The telegraph consists essentially of (1) a line-wire, or main conductor; (2) a battery, or other source of electricity; (3) a transmitting instrument, or device for connecting or disconnecting the line-wire with the battery, or for changing the polarity of the current sent over the line-wire; and (4) a receiver, or indicating or recording apparatus. The line-wire is, for land lines, most commonly of iron, but sometimes of steel covered with a copper tube, and frequently also (especially on the rapid circuits in England) of hard drawn copper and, for the local connections with the battery or instruments, of copper. The source of electricity may be a battery or a dynamo. The transmitter or receiver may vary greatly according to the system in which it is used. In the electromechanical systems in which the message is read by sight, two different receivers are employed. The first of these, the needle-telegraph of Cooke and Wheatstone of England, has a line-wire, a battery, and a simple device for reversing the current by the movement of a handle. The receiver is a needle supported on a horizontal bar, free to turn to the right or left, and provided with an index needle, placed in front of a dial, to show the deflections. The needle is within a coil of wire through which the current from the line passes, the whole forming an electric multiplier or galvanoscope. The message is indicated by an alphabet of motions, deflections to one side being read as the dots and to the other as the dashes of the Morse alphabet. This system is still used on some unimportant circuits and on some of the railway lines in England. It is largely in use for long submarine cables, Thomson's mirror-galvanoscope being used. This receiver consists essentially of a galvanometer, the needle of which carries a small mirror that reflects a beam of light from a lamp upon a screen. The minute movements of the needle are thus rendered visible on a large scale, and the vibrations of the spot of light serve to spell the message. The second sight-reading system is the dial-telegraph; it employs a dial and index or pointer for a receiver. The letters are placed round the edge of the dial, and the index travels round the dial from letter to letter till the right one is reached, when a slight pause indicates that the letter was signaled from the transmitting end of the line. This system is used for private lines and for local circuits where speed of transmission is not important. The Morse system employs a line-wire, battery, and circuit-breaker or Morse key as a transmitter, and now very commonly uses a sounder as a receiving instrument, the slight clicking sound of the instrument clearly indicating the letters of the alphabet. This system has developed from the recording telegraph which was invented by Morse of New York, and was first tried on a commercial scale between Baltimore and Washington in 1844. (See Morse telegraph, below.) The electromechanical systems in which the message is automatically recorded as it is received include the Morse system using the Morse receiver, the chemical telegraphs, the printing telegraphic systems, the stock-reporting telegraphs, the syphon recorder, and the writing-telegraphs. A number of telegraphic-printing systems have been invented, the object being to print the message directly on paper as fast as received. Of these, the systems of House and Hughes were successfully worked in the United States, and a modification of Hughes's apparatus, the electromotor printing-telegraph of Phelps, is still used by the Western Union Company. Hughes's apparatus is still used in Europe, especially in France. Several simpler forms of type printing-telegraphs are used as stock-printers and private-line telegraphs. The telegraph of Cowper, and the telautograph (which see) of Elisha Gray are examples of facsimile- or writing-telegraphs. In the former system two wires are used, and the message is transmitted by varying the intensity of the currents in the double line. The transmitter consists of a pencil connected by means of light rods with metal plates joined together through resistance-coils. The message is written on a band of paper passing under the pencil, and every movement of the pencil causes one or both of the rods to move over the plates, and change the resistance in the circuits. The receiver consists of a pen held upright, and joined by means of threads to the armatures of two magnets placed so that variations of the currents through the two circuits give motions in two rectangular directions to the pen. The pen thus gives a trace in one direction or the other, or in a curve that is the resultant of both movements, and this trace is a literal copy of the message written by the transmitting pencil. The electrochemical systems of telegraphy all give a record of the message, and the transmitting device, whether a Morse key or some automatic mechanism, breaks or closes the circuit and thus either spells the message in the Morse alphabet, or copies it from writing or a drawing properly arranged at the transmitting end. The receiving apparatus in all these systems depends on the fact that if a current of electricity is made to pass through a piece of paper moistened in certain chemicals, a discoloration of the paper appears wherever the current passes. The first practical system is that of Bain of Edinburgh, which was used for some time both in England and in America. Several forms of copying telegraphs exist, but are little used. It was early recognized in the history of telegraphy that the cost of sending messages could be reduced if more than one message could be sent over a line-wire at one time, or if the speed of transmission could be made very great. Of the many systems designed to accomplish this, six are in actual use. These systems are the duplex of Stearns, 1872; the quadruplex of Edison, 1874 (see duplex telegraph, below); the harmonic of Gray, 1874; the rapid system, 1880; the synchronous system, 1884; and the alternate-current system of Crehore and Squier, 1896. The harmonic system depends on the property possessed by sonorous bodies of responding to vibrations corresponding to their own pitch or rate of vibrations. A vibrating reed is used to transmit over the line a series of electrical impulses exactly corresponding to its rate of vibrations. At the receiving end of the line is another reed that vibrates at the same rate as long as connected with the line, giving to the ear of the operator an apparently continuous note. By means of a Morse key this continuous tone in both reeds may be broken up into the letters of a message. Besides this, if two or more reeds are placed at the sending end of the line, and an equal number having the same pitches at the receiving end of the line, all may transmit their rate of vibration to the current, and each receiving reed will select its own note and no other. By the use of a Morse key to each pair, it thus becomes possible to transmit as many messages as there are pairs of reeds over the same wire at the same time. The so-called rapid system of telegraphy is an electrochemical system, with automatic transmitting and receiving instruments. The message is first prepared by punching a series of holes in a strip of paper, each perforation or group of perforations representing a letter. This strip of paper is then made to pass rapidly under metal points connected with the line. At each perforation, one of the points passes through the paper and closes the circuit through the line-wire. At the receiving end, each closing of the circuit makes a stain on a band of prepared paper drawn rapidly under a stylus in connection with the line. Both the transmission and the recording of the message are automatic, and a large number of messages can be sent over one wire in a short time. The synchronous system is wholly electromechanical, and is based on the phonic wheel of La Cour. This invention employs a wheel divided radially into a number of sections, every alternate section being connected with the battery, and the alternating sections being connected by wire to the earth. A trailing needle connected with the line-wire rests on the upper side of the wheel, and as the wheel revolves it touches every section in turn, connecting the line with the battery at one section and being cut out at the next. Two wheels are used, one at each end of the line, and as each needle on the two wheels touches the same section the circuit is closed through the line, and then broken as the needles touch the next sections. In the synchronous system branch wires extend from each wheel, every branch being connected with a number of sections, and, as the wheels turn, these branches are connected with the line a number of times in a second, or often enough to be practically always joined to the line, and thus messages may be sent by the Morse or other system. Upward of seventy branch wires may be connected with each end of a line-wire, every pair having the line to itself in succession, and yet with sufficient rapidity to be, as far as sight or sound is concerned, wholly independent of all others. The phonic wheel is in this system made useful on a commercial scale in telegraphy.



2. A telegraphic message or despatch; a telegram. Trollope. [Rare.]—Acoustic telegraph. See acoustic.—Autographic telegraph. See autographic.—Automatic signal telegraph, a system used for transmitting fire-alarms, in which the number of the box from which the alarm is sent is automatically struck or registered.—Automatic telegraph, a system in which the signals are transmitted automatically, generally by the use of bands of paper perforated with holes which in form and arrangement represent the message to be sent. The paper moves rapidly between two parts or poles of the circuit, which is complete during the passage of a perforation, but broken at other times. The perforated slips may be quickly prepared and by persons not skilled in telegraphy, so that economy as well as great rapidity is secured by their use.—Automatic typewriter telegraph, a telegraphic system in which the transmitter consists of a keyboard similar to that of a type-writer, and which prints the message at the receiving end.—Chemical telegraph. See def. 1.—Copying telegraph. Same as autographic telegraph.—Dial-telegraph. See def. 1.—Duplex telegraph, a telegraphic system arranged for double transmission, or the sending of two messages at the same time over one line, in opposite directions. Several methods for accomplishing this have been devised, one of the most successful being the differential system, in which the electromagnet at each end is so wound that if the key at the distant station is not closed, the current divides equally, one half going to earth and the other half to the distant point, while the instrument at hand is not affected. In this way each receiving instrument is active only when the distant operator closes his key. Each operator has thus control of the receiving instrument of the other, and double transmission without interference becomes possible. In the quadruplex telegraph four messages are transmitted on one line at the same time. Various systems of multiplex telegraphy have been devised, by means of which many messages may be transmitted over one line at the same time. Among these is the harmonic telegraph. (See def. 1.) Other systems of multiplex telegraphy depend on the synchronous movement of parts, such as revolving disks, by means of which local circuits at the extremities of the main line are regularly and rapidly placed in connection with each other through the main conducting wire.—Electric telegraph, the instrument, apparatus, device, or process by means of which electricity is utilized for the rapid transmission of intelligence between distant points. All varieties of electric telegraph have in common one or more conducting wires joining the points between which transmission takes place. At one end is a sending instrument, or transmitter, and at the other a receiving instrument. By the sending instrument electric impulses are transmitted through the line to the receiver, where they produce visible or audible signals capable of translation into words and sentences. Batteries, dynamos, or any other convenient source may supply the electricity. The conducting wire may be supported in the air upon insulators attached to poles, or it may be buried underground or sunk under water (being first covered with some good insulating material). Many different systems of telegraph have been devised, depending on different methods of transmitting and receiving the electric impulses. The latter may be of the simplest kind, and so related to each other in time and character as to produce signals which conform to the requirements of a conventional alphabet, as in the Morse system of telegraphy; or they may be made to operate a mechanism at the receiving end so as to write or print the message. See def. 1.—Facsimile telegraph. Same as autographic telegraph.—Fire-alarm telegraph. See fire-alarm.—Harmonic telegraph. See def. 1.—Magnetic telegraph, the electric telegraph.—Mechanical telegraph. See mechanical, and def. 1.—Morse telegraph, a telegraphic system consisting essentially of a transmitting key operated by the hand, together with an electromagnetic receiver or register which records the signals in the form of dots and dashes. The registering apparatus is usually dispensed with and the signals read "by sound," the receiving magnet with its armature being known as a sounder. The currents from the line are passed through the magnet a (see cut) and cause it to attract its armature b, which brings the stop c against the anvil d, giving out a clear click for each current sent. The audible signals consist of short and long intervals of contact, corresponding to dots and dashes, and are interpreted by means of the Morse alphabet (which see, under alphabet). When the line is more than a mile or two in length, the signals are usually received first on a relay, which is similar in form to a sounder, but so constructed that its armature responds to feeble currents. The end of this armature acts as a key in a local circuit which operates the sounder or register.—Needle-telegraph. See def. 1.—Octoplex telegraph, a telegraph by which eight messages can be sent at the same time over a single wire.—Optical telegraph. (a) A semaphore. (b) An electric telegraph of the needle or pointer class.—Phonoplex telegraph, a telegraph in which multiplex telegraphy is secured by combining telephonic communication with an ordinary telegraph system.—Pneumatic telegraph. (a) A form of telegraph, formerly in use, in which messages were transmitted by the agency of a column of water under pneumatic pressure. (b) A system of transmission for signals in which a bell is sounded and a pointer caused to indicate a message by the compression of air in a reservoir at one end of a long tube, the compression being transmitted to the opposite end of the tube. This system is used in hotels, manufactories, etc., and to transmit steering and steaming directions on shipboard.—Polygrammatic telegraph. See polygrammatic.—Printing-telegraph, a telegraph in which the message is printed Phelps's Electromotor Printing-telegraph.

The transmitting apparatus is shown on the left-hand side and the receiving apparatus on the right—the two being separated by a glass partition fn. In the apparatus here shown the receiving and transmitting parts are separate, and are driven by independent motors. A combined apparatus is also made, in which both sets of mechanism are driven by one motor; in other respects the mechanism is practically the same. The message is transmitted by manipulating a set of keys shown at b. These keys move a set of vertical rods arranged in a circle within the cylinder c. The tops of these rods carry a set of sectors arranged to form a disk round the revolving shaft of the sending mechanism. The part of any revolution at which a current is sent to line depends on the key pressed, and, as the receiving mechanism is kept moving in synchronism (the type-wheel making the same number of revolutions as the revolving shaft here referred to), the current sent by any particular key can be made to print the corresponding letter on the paper ribbon. The circuit-closing arrangement, which is worked by a vertical rod passing through the top of the cylinder c, is shown at d. The electromotor is shown at c, and an electromagnetic key, actuated by the currents which pass through the circuit-closer d, and used to send out the line-currents, is shown at a. In the receiving apparatus h is the paper-drum which contains the roll of paper m on which the message is printed as it is drawn past the type-wheel at j. The motor is shown at i, and is similar to that shown at c.

in ordinary Roman characters by the receiving instrument.—Recording telegraph, a telegraph provided with an apparatus which makes a record of the message transmitted.—Solar telegraph, a telegraph in which the rays of the sun are projected from and upon mirrors; a heliostat. The duration of the rays makes the alphabet, after the manner of the dot-and-dash telegraphic alphabet.—Submarine telegraph. See submarine cable, under cable.—Submarine Telegraph Act, a British statute of 1885 (48 and 49 Vict., c. 49) confirming the Convention of the Powers for the protection of telegraph-cables.—Telegraph Act, a British statute of 1868 (31 and 32 Vict., c. 110) which authorized the purchase and operation of telegraph lines by the Post-office. Other British statutes regulating the construction and maintenance of telegraphs are also known by this title.

steel wires, such as is used for submarine work (the conductor is shown at d, and is usually surrounded by a gutta-percha or india-rubber tube for insulation); b shows the end of a multiple-wire cable suitable for aërial suspension; while c is a similar multiple cable inclosed in a metal tube, usually of lead, suitable for underground work.

telegraph-clock (tel'ē-grȧf-klok), n. A clock whose rate controls that of others, or is itself controlled, by electric impulses transmitted through telegraph-wires.

telegraph-dial (tel'ē-grȧf-dī″al), n. A dial bearing the letters of the alphabet, figures, etc., arranged in a circle, with a pointer actuated by electromagnetism.

telegrapher (tel'ē-graf-ėr or tē-leg'ra-fėr), n. One who is skilled in telegraphy; one whose occupation is the sending of telegraphic messages, especially by the electric telegraph; a telegraph-operator.—Telegraphers' cramp or palsy, an occupation neurosis of telegraphers, similar to writers' cramp.

telegraphic (tel-ē-graf'ik), a. [= F. télégraphique = Sp. telegráfico = Pg. telegraphico = It. telegrafico; as telegraph + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the telegraph; made by a telegraph; used in telegraphing: as, telegraphic signals; telegraphic art.—2. Communicated or transmitted by a telegraph: as, telegraphic intelligence.

telegraphical (tel-ē-graf'i-kal), a. [< telegraphic + -al.] Same as telegraphic.

telegraphically (tel-ē-graf'i-kal-i), adv. 1. In a telegraphic manner; by means of the telegraph.—2. As regards telegraphic communication: as, a town telegraphically isolated.

telegraphist (tel'ē-graf-ist or tē-leg'ra-fist), n. [< telegraph + -ist.] A telegrapher.

telegraph-key (tel'ē-grȧf-kē), n. A device for making and breaking an electric circuit by the movement of the fingers and hand. It usually consists of a bar or lever pivoted in the middle, having a button of some insulating material attached at one end, below which are two platinum-points whose contact at c in the figure completes the circuit. The insulating button is held by the thumb and first two fingers, and stops are arranged to control the play or movement of the lever. The two ends of a break in the line-wire are connected to the terminals t, t, and the break is bridged over by the lever b each time it is depressed during the transmission of message. When the key is not being used the lever is held against its back-stop s by the spring p, and the break is bridged over by putting the lever l in the position shown.

telegraphophone (tel-ē-graf'ō-fōn), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + E. graphophone.] An apparatus for reproducing at a distance the sounds which produced a graphophonic record; also, an apparatus for producing a graphophonic record at a distance by means of a telephonic circuit.

telegraph-plant (tel'ē-grȧf-plant), n. The East Indian Meibomia gyrans, a plant with trifoliolate leaves, of which the lateral leaflets are very small and remarkable for their spontaneous jerking motion, suggesting signaling. In a warm humid atmosphere they alternately rise and fall, quickly changing their position, sometimes almost 180 degrees, while they also rotate on their own axes. Also moving-plant and semaphore-plant.

telegraph-pole (tel'ē-grȧf-pōl), n. One of a series of poles or posts for supporting an elevated telegraph-line. Where there are more wires than one, they are usually fixed to cross-bars on the posts, an insulator being interposed in each case between the post or bar and the wire.

telegraph-post (tel'ē-grȧf-pōst), n. A telegraph-pole.

telegraph-reel (tel'ē-grȧf-rēl), n. In a recording telegraph, the reel on which is wound the endless strip of paper on which the messages are printed or otherwise indicated.

telegraph-register (tel'ē-grȧf-rej″is-tėr), n. A form of receiving instrument which makes a permanent record of the signals received. See ★cut under recorder.

telegraphy (tel'ē-graf-i or tē-leg'ra-fi), n. [= F. télégraphie; as telegraph + -y[3].] The art or practice of communicating intelligence by a telegraph; the science or art of constructing or managing telegraphs.—Aërial, duplex telegraphy. See the adjectives.—Wireless telegraphy, the transmission of signals between points not connected by electrical conductors; specifically, the transmission of signals through space by means of electric waves; a system of telegraphy based upon the researches of Heinrich Hertz, who demonstrated that the oscillatory discharge of an electric circuit acting as a transmitter produces electric waves which are capable of setting up an oscillatory discharge in a similar receiving-circuit. A method of utilizing these waves for the transmission of signals was devised by Guglielmo Marconi. His experiments were first made in Bologna in 1895, and they were continued in England from July, 1896, under the auspices of the British Post-office. In March, 1899, communication was established across the English Channel between Dover, England, and Wimereux, France, a distance of 32 miles, the rate of transmission being about 20 words a minute. Signals were first successfully sent across the Atlantic ocean from Poldhu, Cornwall, to St. Johns, Newfoundland, on Dec. 12, 1901. In the meantime numerous other inventors and electricians entered the field, many of whom have contributed greatly to the development of the art. An important feature of most systems of wireless telegraphy is the use, both at the transmitting- and receiving-stations, of aërial conductors (commonly called antennæ) supported by a mast or tower. On shipboard the aërial conductors usually consist of a group of parallel wires strung horizontally between the top masts and thence down to a deck-house containing the sending- and receiving-apparatus. The distance to which signals can be transmitted depends upon the amount of energy radiated by the antennæ in the form of electrical oscillations of suitable wave-length (from 100 to 5000 meters). The transmitting-device, of which there are many modifications, usually consists of a power-circuit and an oscillatory circuit. The power-circuit contains an alternater, a (Fig. 1), sometimes of 50 kilowatts or more, and the primary coil, p, of a step-up transformer. The oscillatory circuit consists of the secondary coil, s, of this transformer, a condenser, c, and spark-gap, g, in multiple, and the aërial conductors, o. When the capacity and the inductance, l, of this circuit are properly adjusted, powerful oscillations of high frequency are set up and electric waves are sent out through space from the conductors. At the receiving-station electrical oscillations are set up by these waves in a similar set of aërial conductors, and although they are of very feeble intensity compared with those at the transmitting-station, they suffice to operate some one of the sensitive forms of receiving-apparatus employed. The receiver originally used by Marconi was the coherer, an instrument devised by Branly (1890) and based on the discovery by Munk (1835) that a mass of filings or other small metallic bodies so loosely packed as to be non-conducting became conducting under the action of the discharge from a Leyden jar. The coherer has since been almost entirely replaced by numerous more manageable devices, such as the various electrolytic detectors of Neugschwender, Aschkinass, Schlömilch, De Forest, Fessenden, Vreeland, and Brown; the magnetic detectors of Rutherford and Marconi; the microphone of Hughes; the barretter of Fessenden; the audion of De Forest; the thermo-electric detector of Austin; and the carborundum detector of Brandes. The detector is sometimes directly in circuit between the antennæ and the earth, as in Fig. 2, in which o is the set of antennæ, d is the detector, e is the earth, b a battery, and t a telephone; sometimes in the secondary circuit of a transformer the primary coil of which is in the circuit between the antennæ and the earth. The detector, whatever its form, serves as a sort of delicate relay to alter the current flow in a local circuit containing a battery and some convenient form of telegraphic receiving-instrument or a telephone. The electric waves from the antennæ of a station for wireless telegraphy are not all of the same frequency, but have a range of an octave or more. The intensity is greatest for a certain frequency, that of the so-called principal wave of the oscillatory circuit, and diminishes rapidly for longer or shorter waves. If, for example, the principal wave has a length of 600 meters the accompanying waves of 500 meters and 700 meters may have only one tenth of the intensity of the principal wave. By adjusting the frequency to which the receiving-circuit best responds to agreement with that of the transmitting-circuit,—a process termed syntony, which is analogous to the tuning of musical instruments,—the distance at which signals may be heard is greatly increased, while other instruments at nearer stations or on shipboard in the neighborhood of the sending-station will, if tuned to other frequencies, be comparatively undisturbed.

telehydrobarometer (tel-ē-hī-drō-ba-rom′e-tėr), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + ὑδωρ, water, + E. barometer.] An instrument for recording electrically at a distance the head of water, or of any liquid contained in a reservoir.

teleianthous (tel-ī-an′thus), a. [NL., < Gr. τέλειος, finished, perfect, + ἄνθος, a flower.] In bot., perfect- or hermaphrodite-flowered.

teleiconograph (tel″ē-ī-kon′ō-grȧf), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + εἰκών, an image, + γράφειν, write.] A combination of the telescope and camera lucida devised by M. Revoil. The camera lucida is attached to the eyepiece of the telescope in such a way that the observer sees an image of the objects visible in the field of view apparently projected upon a sheet of paper placed on a table below the eyepiece, where he can easily sketch their outlines. He has the scale of the drawing at command, since the size of the image depends on the distance between the eye and the paper.

teleity† (te-lē′i-ti), n. [< Gr. τέλειος, finished, perfect, + -ity.] End; tendency to fulfil a function or purpose. Gentleman Instructed, p. 427.

telekinesis (tel″ē-ki-nē′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. τῆλε, afar, + κίνησις, movement: see kinetic.] Movement of or motion in an object, animate or inanimate, produced without contact with the body producing the motion. See the quotation under telekinetic. [Recent.]

telekinetic (tel″ē-ki-net′ik), a. [< telekinesis + -ic (cf. kinetic).] Pertaining to telekinesis.

For the alleged movements without contact, which form an important branch of "so-called Spiritualistic phenomena," M. Aksakof's new word telekinetic seems to me the best attainable. It need not, of course, imply an actio in distans, without any intervening medium, but rather an action exercised upon a body so situated with regard to the assumed agent that no exercise of any known force would have originated the body's movement.
Myers, Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, Dec., 1890, p. 669.

telelograph (tē-lel′ō-grȧf), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + λόγος, word, + γράφειν, write.] A modified form of semaphore, invented by R. Lovell Edgeworth about the close of the eighteenth century. The signals were four long wooden isosceles triangles, each of which had eight definite positions, representing the numerical figures 1 to 7 and zero. One of the pieces represented units, and the others respectively tens, hundreds, and thousands; by the use of the different signals in different positions any number below eight thousand not containing the figures 8 or 9 could be signaled. Words could be assigned to these numbers according to any prearranged code.

telemanometer (tel-ē-mā-nom′e-tėr), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + E. manometer.] A manometer or pressure-gage that registers its indications at a distance by means of electric registering apparatus.

telemeteorograph (tel-ē-mē′tē-ō-rō-grȧf), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + μετέωρον, a meteor, + γράφειν, write.] A meteorograph in which the recording apparatus is at a distance from the actuating instruments, and is operated electrically. It is the combination in one registering-instrument of a telethermograph, a telebarograph, and a teleanemograph.

telemeteorographic (tel-ē-mē″tē-ō-rō-graf′ik), a. [< telemeteorograph + -ic.] Pertaining to the telemeteorograph; relating to registration by meteorological instruments at a distance.

telemeter (tē-lem′e-tėr), n. [< F. télémètre, < Gr. τῆλε, afar, + μέτρον, measure.] 1. An instrument for determining distances in surveying, in artillery practice, etc. Sometimes the whole apparatus, sometimes the angle-measuring part only, and sometimes only the graduated rod to be observed at a distance is called a telemeter. When such a rod is used the amount subtended by a fixed angle is observed.
2. An apparatus for recording electrically at a distance the indications of a physical or meteorological instrument.—Acoustic telemeter, an apparatus for determining a distance by the time occupied in traversing it by the sound of a detonation.

telemetric (tel-ē-met′rik), a. [< telemetr-y + -ic.] Pertaining to automatic registration at a distance of the indications of physical and meteorological instruments.

Telemetric aid to meteorological records.
Science, VI. 194.

telemetry (tē-lem′e-tri), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + -μετρία, < μέτρον, measure.] 1. The art of measuring distances by the use of telemeters.—2. The art of recording at a distance the indications of scientific instruments.

telemotor (tel′ē-mō-tor), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + E. motor.] A motor used to steer a ship, in which the power generated by the helmsman moving the wheel on the bridge or pilot-house, at a distance from the tiller, is transmitted to another motor or apparatus directly connected with the tiller or steering-engine. The transmission of power from the prime motor may be by chains or ropes or electric wires or by hydrostatic or pneumatic devices.

telengiscope (tē-len′ji-skōp), n. [Irreg. < Gr. τῆλε, afar, + ἐγγύς, near, + σκοπεῖν, view: see scope.] An instrument which combines the powers of the telescope and of the microscope.

Telenomus (tē-len′ō-mus), n. [NL. (Haliday, 1833); formation uncertain.] A large genus of hymenopterous parasites, of the proctotrypid subfamily Scelioninæ, comprising numerous minute chalcid-like forms which are all or nearly all parasitic in the eggs of hemipterous or lepidopterous insects.

Teleobranchia (tel″ē-ō-brang′ki-ȧ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τέλεος, τέλειος, complete, full-grown, perfect (< τέλος, end, completion), + βράγχια, gills.] A group of rostriferous gastropods, with the gills of few (12 to 15) laminæ in regular descending spiral rows on the left side of the mantle-cavity, the operculum distinct, and the aperture of the shell contracted moderately and roundish. It includes the families Planaxidæ, Rissoidæ, Melaniidæ, Cerithiidæ, Viviparidæ, and others.

teleobranchiate (tel″ē-ō-brang′ki-āt), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Teleobranchia, or having their characters.
II. n. A member of the Teleobranchia.

teleocephal (tel″ē-ō-sef′al), n. Any teleocephalous fish. Amer. Nat., May, 1890.

Teleocephali (tel″ē-ō-sef′a-lī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of teleocephalus*: see teleocephalous.] An order of teleost fishes, including those whose cranium has the full complement of bones.

teleocephalous (tel″ē-ō-sef′a-lus), a. [< NL. telcocephalus*, < Gr. τέλεος, τέλειος, complete, + κεφαλή, head.] Having the full number of bones in the skull; of or pertaining to the Teleocephali.

Teleodesmacea (tel″ē-ō-des-mā′sē-ȧ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τέλεος, τέλειος, complete, + δεσμός, band, ligament.] An order of bivalve mollusks, formed by W. H. Dall to include all those whose hinge is highly specialized or perfected. The division includes 12 suborders, and the name is contrasted with Anomalodesmacea and with Prionodesmacea. Nature, XLI. 188.

teleodesmacean (tel″ē-ō-des-mā′sē-an), a. and n. [< Teleodesmacea + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Teleodesmacea.
II. n. Any member of the Teleodesmacea. W. H. Dall.

teleologic (tel″ē-ō-loj′ik), a. and n. [< teleolog-y + -ic.] I. a. Teleological.

Value in use, or, as Mr. De Quincey calls it, teleologic value, is the extreme limit of value in exchange.
J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., III. i. § 2.

II. n. The science of final causes. [Rare.]

Technic and Teleologic are the two branches of practical knowledge, founded respectively on conation and feeling, and are both together, as Ethic, opposed to Theoretic, which is founded on cognition.
S. H. Hodgson, Time and Space, § 68.

teleological (tel″ē-ō-loj′i-kal), a. [< teleologic + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or relating to teleology, or the doctrine of final causes; pertaining to or of the nature of a design or purpose.

teleologically (tel ē-ō-loj′i-kal-i), adv. With reference to or as regards teleology; on teleological grounds; by or with reference to purpose or design.

teleologism (tel-ē-ol′ō-jizm), n. [< teleolog-y + -ism.] Teleology; also, the acceptance of teleology, or belief in that doctrine. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXV. 278.

teleologist (tel-ē-ol′ō-jist), n. [< teleolog-y + -ist.] One who maintains the doctrine of or studies final causes. Compare ætiologist.

teleology (tel-ē-ol′ō-ji), n. [< NL. teleologia (Chr. Wolf), < Gr. τέλος (gen. τέλεος), completion, final end, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The doctrine of final causes; the theory of tendency to an end.

teleometer (tel-ē-om′e-tėr), n. A telemeter.

teleophobia (tel″ē-ō-fō′bi-ȧ), n. [NL., < Gr. τέλος (gen. τέλεος), end, + φόβος, fear.] That disposition of mind which results in great unwillingness to admit that things tend toward definite ends, or that anything in nature is determined by anything not yet in existence. See dysteleology.

teleophore (tel′ē-ō-fōr), n. [< Gr. τέλεος, τέλειος, complete, + -φορος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] A gonotheca.

teleophyte (tel′ē-ō-fīt), n. [< Gr. τέλεος, τέλειος, complete, + φυτόν, plant.] A plant composed of an aggregate of units, i. e., a very highly developed plant, as a tree. Compare teleozoön. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 43.

teleorganic (tel″ē-ôr-gan′ik), a. [< Gr. τέλεος, τέλειος, complete, + ὄργανον, an organ.] Accomplishing the purpose of organism; vital, necessary to organic life: as, teleorganic forces.

teleosaur (tel′ē-ō-sâr), n. [< NL. Teleosaurus.] A fossil crocodile of the family Teleosauridæ.

teleosaurian (tel″ē-ō-sâ′ri-an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Teleosauridæ, or having their characters.
II. n. A member of the Teleosauridæ.

Teleosauridæ (tel ē-ō-sâ′ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Teleosaurus + -idæ.] A family of fossil crocodiles, typified by the genus Teleosaurus, having a long narrow snout with terminal nostrils, the posterior nares bounded by the palatines (the pterygoids not being united below), and the vertebræ amphicœlous. They are characteristic of the Jurassic formation.

Teleosaurus (tel″ē-ō-sâ′rus), n. [NL., < Gr. τέλεος, τέλειος, complete, + σαῦρος, a lizard.] The typical genus of Teleosauridæ.

teleost (tel′ē-ost), a. and n. [< NL. teleosteus*, < Gr. τέλεος, τέλειος, complete, + ὀστέον, bone.] I. a. In ichth., osseous, as a fish; having a well-ossified skeleton, as ordinary fishes; of or pertaining to the Teleostei.
II. n. An osseous fish; any member of the Teleostei. See cuts on following page, and cuts under Esox, optic, palatoquadrate, parusphenoid.

teleostean (tel-ē-os′tē-an), a. and n. [< teleost + -e-an.] Same as teleost.

Teleostei (tel-ē-os′tē-ī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of teleosteus*: see teleost.] The teleosts, or ordinary bony fishes; a subclass of true fishes. They have a well-developed brain, whose optic nerves cross each other, but without any chiasm; the heart is provided with a non-contractile arterial bulb; the fins have well-developed and distinct rays; the skeleton is generally completely ossified, and the backbone consists entirely or mostly of separate well-ossified vertebræ.

teleostomate (tel-ē-os′tō-māt), a. [< teleostom-ous + -ate[1].] Same as teleostomous.

Skull of Pike (Esox lucius), a teleost fish, showing most of the bones.

Upper and middle figures, side and top views without the bones of the jaws; lower, side view with the bones of the jaws. a, articular facet for hyomandibular bone; x, parasphenoid; y, basisphenoid; z, alisphenoid; V, VII, exits of fifth and seventh nerves; 1, 2, 3, bones apparently replacing nasals; An, angular bone; Ar, articular; BO, basioccipital; Brq, branchiostegal rays; D, dentary; EO, exoccipital; EpO, epiotic; Fr, frontal; HM, hyomandibular; IOp, interoperculum; Mx, maxillary; Mt, metapterygoid; Op, operculum; Pa, parietal; Pl, palatoquadrate arch; Pmx, premaxilla; Prf, prefrontal; PrO, proötic; PrOp, præoperculum; PrS, presphenoid; Pif, postfrontal; Qu, quadrate; SO, supra-occipital; SOp, suboperculum; SOr, suborbital; Sq, squamosal; Sy, symplectic; Vo, vomer.

Skull of Perch (Perca fluviatilis), a teleostome.

1, frontal; 2, prefrontal; 4, sphenotic; 7, parietal; 8, supra-occipital; 9, epiotic; 11, proötic; 12, pterotic; 17, premaxilla; 18, maxilla; 19, first suborbital or lacrymal bone; 19′, chain of suborbitals; 20, nasal; 21, one of a chain of post-temporal ossicles; 23, hyomandibular; 24, ectopterygoid; 26, quadrate; 27, metapterygoid; 28, operculum; 30, præoperculum; 31, symplectic; 32, suboperculum; 33, interoperculum; 34, dentary; 35, articular; 36, angular; 42, urohyal; 46, post-temporal, or bone connecting scapular arch with the skull.

teleostome (tel′ē-ō-stōm), n. [< NL. teleostomus: see teleostomous.] One of the Teleostomi; any true fish.

Teleostomi (tel-ē-os′tō-mī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of teleostomus: see teleostomous.] A subclass or class of true fishes, having the arch of the upper jaw formed by specialized jaw-bones (generally both intermaxillary and supramaxillary) and a more or less developed set of membrane-bones. The group is contrasted with the selachians or elasmobranchs, and includes both the teleosts and the ganoids. Compare Selachostomi, Cyclostomi, Cirrostomi.

teleostomous (tel-ē-os′tō-mus), a. [< NL. teleostomus, < Gr. τέλεος, τέλειος, complete, + στόμα, mouth.] Having the character of a teleostome; pertaining to the Teleostomi.

teleotemporal (tel″ē-ō-tem′pō-ral), n. [< Gr. τέλεος, τέλειος, complete, + L. tempora, temples: see temporal[2].] A bone of the scapular arch in fishes, otherwise called postclavicle.

teleotrocha, n. pl. Same as telotrocha.

teleozoic (tel″ē-ō-zō′ik), a. [< teleozo-on + -ic.] Of the character of a teleozoön; pertaining to the teleozoa; metazoan; not protozoan.

teleozoön (tel″ē-ō-zō′on), n.; pl. teleozoa (-ȧ). [NL., < Gr. τέλεος, τέλειος, complete, + ζῷον, an animal.] A complete animal; a metazoan as distinguished from a protozoan organism, consisting of differentiated cells or specialized tissues. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 199.

telepathic (tel-ē-path′ik), a. [< telepath-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to telepathy. [Recent.]

telepathically (tel-ē-path′i-kal-i), adv. In a telepathic manner; by means of telepathy; according to the principles or doctrine of telepathy. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 500. [Recent.]

telepathist (tel′ē-path-ist or tē-lep′a-thist), n. [< telepath-y + -ist.] One who is versed in telepathic phenomena, or who upholds the doctrine of telepathy. [Recent.]

telepathy (tel′ē-path-i or tē-lep′a-thi), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + -παθεια, < πάθος, suffering, feeling (cf. sympathy).] The direct communication of one mind with another otherwise than in ordinary and recognized ways; the supposed action of one mind on another at a distance without the use of words, looks, gestures, or other material signs; also, the resulting mental state or affection. The assumption is that certain extraordinary phenomena cannot be explained on any recognized principles of physical science. Also called thought-transference and mind-reading. [Recent.]

We venture to introduce the words Telæsthesia and Telepathy to cover all cases of impression received at a distance without the normal operation of the recognised sense organs. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 147.

telepheme (tel′ē-fēm), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + φήμη, saying, talk: see fame[1].] A telephonic message. [Recent.]

We shall ask a dispensation to permit us to introduce a new word into the language. It is telepheme. The use of such phrases as "telephonic communication," "telephonic message," "news by telephone," and the like seems a little clumsy, and a single word expressing their meaning has become a desideratum.

W. Balestier, in Rochester (N. Y.) Post-Express, August 5th, 1882.

Telephium (tē-lē′fi-um), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), a name in use among herbalists from J. Camerarius, 1588; < L. telephion, < Gr. τηλέφιον, an herb resembling purslane, said to have been named from Telephus, a mythic king of Mysia and son of Hercules.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, of the family Silenaceæ and tribe Sperguleæ. It is characterized by flowers with five petals, five stamens, a three-celled ovary, becoming in fruit a three-angled papery pod included in the calyx, many-seeded at its base, and loculicidally three- to four-valved. There are six species recognized by recent authors, natives of the Mediterranean region. They are spreading glaucous herbs, often from a perennial rootstock, bearing alternate twin or opposite leaves, which are oval or oblong and without nerves, and are minutely stipulate. The small white flowers form terminal cymes. ★T. Imperati is the tree-orpine, formerly cultivated.

telephone (tel′ē-fōn), n. [= F. téléphone = G. telephon = Sw. Dan. telefon (all after E.); < Gr. τῆλε, afar, + φωνή, voice, sound.] An instrument or apparatus for the transmission of sound to a distant point. The word is generally restricted to devices for the transmission of articulate speech by the agency of electricity. The process consists essentially of the transmission of electric waves or impulses which agree in period and phase with atmospheric waves produced by sound. These in turn, by means of an electromagnet, cause vibrations of a plate or membrane, which agitate the air in a manner similar to the original disturbance, and thus reproduce the sound. As in telegraphy, a telephonic system includes a transmitter, a conducting wire, and a receiver. In the magneto-electric telephone the transmitter and receiver are identical. A thin iron disk is placed very near, but not quite touching, the end of a small bar of steel permanently magnetized, about which is wound a coil of thin insulated wire. One end of this wire is connected with the earth and the other with the line. The sound-waves produce vibrations in the iron disk, and as the magnetic field is thus subjected to rapid alterations, currents of electricity are induced, which are transmitted through the line. At the receiving end corresponding changes in the magnetism of the bar of the receiving instrument produce similar vibrations in the iron disk near it, which, in turn, produce sound-waves. When the Bell telephone is used as a transmitter, the sounds are directed toward the mouthpiece p, through a hole in the center of which the vibrations impinge on the diaphragm d. The consequent vibrations of the diaphragm close to the end of the magnet m induce currents in the coil c, which are transmitted to the line wires w through the terminals t. When the instrument is used as a receiver, the pulsatory currents passed through the coil c cause the diaphragm d to vibrate and give out sounds, which are heard by putting p to the ear. Better results, however, are obtained by the use of a different form of transmitter, many varieties of which have been invented. In that most commonly used the motions of the diaphragm cause variations in the strength of a current flowing from a battery through the primary wire of an induction-coil. These variations cause corresponding induced currents to flow through the secondary wire, which is connected with the line. They are generally due to variations of resistance resulting from variations in pressure in carbon, as in Edison's transmitter (called carbon telephone), or in surface contact when hard carbon is used, as in Blake's transmitter. In the latter (see cut) the sounds are directed to the mouthpiece p, which causes the vibrations of the air to impinge on the diaphragm d, on the back and at the center of which rests the point of a spring carrying a small spherical-shaped piece of platinum, s, which presses against a carbon block, b. The current, passing through the primary of the induction-coil i, passes through the contact between the platinum and the carbon, and variations in the resistance of this contact, due to the vibrations of the diaphragm, cause currents to be induced in the secondary of the coil i which are sent into the line circuit. Any form of microphone may be used as a telephone transmitter.—Chemical telephone, a telephone the receiver of which is Edison's monograph.—Dolbear's telephone, a kind of telephone in which the effects are produced by electrostatic forces, and there is no permanent electromagnet in the receiver. The latter consists of two thin metallic plates near to but insulated from each other, constituting in effect a condenser. The varying charge in this condenser, due to the action of the transmitting telephone, causes variations in the mutual attraction of the plates, and in this way the vibrations of the membrane of the transmitter are reproduced.—Membrane telephone, a telephone using a membrane of any substance, but usually of thin sheet-iron, as the part acted upon directly by the sound-vibrations.—Multipolar telephone. See multipolar.—Pulsion telephone, a mechanical telephone having attached to its diaphragm a number of vibrators for the purpose of reinforcing the vibrations.—Telephone-harp, an instrument, used in connection with a telephone, to enable large audiences to distinguish musical sounds.

Dan. teleskop, etc., < NL. telescopium (NGr. τηλεσκόπιον), < Gr. τῆλε, afar, + σκοπεῖν, view.] 1. An optical instrument by means of which distant objects are made to appear nearer and larger. It originated in the first decade of the seventeenth century, apparently earliest in Holland; but Galileo in 1609 independently invented the form which bears his name, published it to the world, and was the first to apply the instrument to astronomical observation. The telescope consists essentially of two members: one, the objective, a large converging lens, or a concave mirror (technically speculum), which forms an optical image of the object; the other, the eyepiece, a small lens or combination of lenses, which magnifies this image. The optical parts are usually set in a tube, and this is so arranged that the distance between the objective and the eyepiece can be adjusted to give the most distinct vision. Telescopes are classed as refracting or reflecting, according as the objective is a lens or a speculum. The simple refracting telescope has for an objective a large convex lens, A (fig. 1), of long focus, while the eyepiece, B, is also a convex lens, but of short focus, the two being placed at a distance slightly less than the sum of their focal lengths. The "real" inverted image of the object formed at m by the object-glass is viewed by the magnifying lens B, the magnifying power being equal to the ratio between the focal lengths of the lenses A and B. With this form of instrument the object is seen inverted. In the Galilean telescope the eye-lens is concave instead of convex, and intercepts the rays from the objective before they reach the focus, so that the object is seen erect. But the field of view is very restricted, and this form of instrument now survives only in the opera-glass. The simple refracting telescope in any of its forms is a very imperfect instrument, owing to the fact that rays of different color are not alike refrangible, the focus being nearer the lens for the blue rays than for the red. By making the telescope very long in proportion to its diameter, the injurious effect of this chromatic aberration can be greatly reduced, and about 1660 Huygens and Cassini used instruments more than 100 feet long in their observations upon Saturn. About the middle of the eighteenth century it was discovered in England that, by combining lenses of different kinds of glass, objectives could be made nearly free from chromatic aberration, and all the refracting telescopes now constructed have achromatic object-glasses of some form. The usual construction is a double-convex lens of crown-glass combined with a (nearly) plano-concave lens of flint-glass, the focal lengths of the two lenses being proportional to their dispersive powers, and the curves so chosen that the spherical aberration is corrected at the same time. But other forms are possible and even preferable. Fig. 2 shows some of those most used. For many years after the invention of the achromatic telescope it was impossible to obtain suitable glass for lenses of more than 5 inches in diameter. The discoveries of Guinand about 1800 partially relieved the difficulty, and from about 1870 to 1911 a considerable number of instruments have been made with apertures exceeding 2 feet: one of 50 inches diameter was constructed for the Paris Exposition (1900); the telescope of Chicago University (given by C. T. Yerkes) is 40 inches. The Lick telescope (fig. 3) is of 36 inches diameter and 57 feet in length, the object-glass by Clark of Cambridge, Massachusetts. That of Pulkowa is 30 inches. The achromatic objective constructed of flint- and crown-glass is, however, by no means perfect, and cannot be made so while these kinds of glass are used. When the correction for the rays of mean wave-length in the spectrum is the best possible, the extreme rays—the red and violet—refuse to coincide with the others, so that the image of a bright object is surrounded by a purple halo, which renders it somewhat indistinct. This "secondary spectrum," as it is called, is not very obtrusive in small instruments, but is a serious defect in large ones, and unfits the ordinary achromatic refractor for photography. For this purpose it is necessary to use an object-glass specially corrected for the violet rays, and therefore practically worthless for visual observations. But while it is impossible to secure a perfect color-correction with any lens composed of ordinary crown- and flint-glass, there is no reason why kinds of glass may not be invented which will render it possible; and since 1880 experiments, under the auspices of the German government, by Professor Abbé at Jena, appear to have resulted in at least partial success. Lenses as large as 12 inches in diameter have been made of the new glass. If large disks of this glass can be obtained sufficiently homogeneous, and not corrosible under exposure to the air, the art of telescope-making will immediately make enormous progress. The reflecting telescope was invented between 1660 and 1670, independently by Gregory and Newton, by the latter as the result of his discovery of the decomposition of light by refraction, which led him to conclude (erroneously) that the faults of the refracting telescope were necessarily incurable. There are four different forms of the instrument, differing only in the method by which the rays reflected by the concave speculum which forms the objective are brought to the eyepiece. In the Gregorian telescope (fig. 4) the rays reflected from the speculum are a second time reflected by a small concave mirror in the center of the tube, and just beyond the focus. The large mirror is perforated, and the eyepiece, placed behind the perforation, receives the rays thus twice reflected. In the Cassegrainian the construction is precisely similar, except that the small mirror is convex, and is placed within the focus; this shortens the instrument a little, but restricts the field of view. In both these forms the observer looks toward the object just as with a refractor. In the Newtonian form, which is the most used, the small mirror is plane, and set at an angle of 45°, so that the rays are reflected out at the side of the tube. Finally, in the front-view or Herschelian form the small mirror is dispensed with, the speculum being slightly tilted so as to throw the image to one side of the mouth of the tube. This saves the loss of light due to the second reflection, but involves some injury to the definition, unless the speculum is now ground and polished with the axis or vertex of its paraboloidal figure at one edge, instead of at the center of the speculum as in the other forms; or unless the focal length of the instrument is very great as compared with its aperture, as in the case of the great horizontal reflecting telescope recently constructed at the Yerkes Observatory. Although the reflecting telescope is entirely free from chromatic aberration, nevertheless, as constructed in the past, it has failed to give as perfect definition, when used for visual observations, as the best refracting telescopes give. In astronomical photography and spectroscopy, however, the perfect achromatism of the reflecting telescope is of supreme importance; recently the most remarkable and perfect photographs of nebulæ and star-clusters which have yet been secured have been made with reflecting telescopes. It is certain that this type of telescope is only now being developed to the state of refinement which has already been attained in the case of the refractor. The speculum is perhaps easier and certainly much less costly to construct than an achromatic object-glass of the same aperture; hence, the largest telescopes ever made have been reflectors. At the head of the list stands the six-foot "leviathan" of Lord Rosse, erected in 1845, and still in use: it is of the Newtonian form. The five-foot silver-on-glass Cassegrainian reflector of Mr. Common, erected in 1889, stands next, and there are in existence a number of instruments with apertures of 3 and 4 feet. Herschel's great telescope, erected in 1789, but long since dismantled, was 48 inches in diameter and 40 feet long. The magnifying power of the telescope depends upon the ratio between the focal length of the object-glass or speculum and that of the eyepiece. (See eyepiece.) It can therefore be altered at pleasure by merely exchanging one eyepiece for another. As a rule, the highest power practically available, with the best object-glasses and under the best circumstances, is from 75 to 100 to every inch of aperture. The illuminating power is proportional, other things being equal, to the area of the object-glass or the speculum; so that a telescope of 12 inches aperture ought to give four times as much light as one with a 6-inch lens; practically, however, the larger lenses, on account of the increase in the thickness of the glass, do not reach their theoretical performance. Reflecting telescopes vary greatly in their light-gathering power. A Newtonian reflector with a silver-on-glass speculum freshly polished is not very greatly inferior in light to an achromatic of the same aperture; but as a rule a reflector in its ordinary working condition has only about half the light of the corresponding refractor. Small telescopes for terrestrial purposes are usually unmounted, but the tube is ordinarily made in several sections which slide into one another, reducing the length of the instrument, and making it more portable, as in the common spy-glass. Larger telescopes are mounted upon stands of some kind, and the practical efficiency of the instrument depends greatly on the firmness and convenient arrangement of the stand. At present telescopes for astronomical use are almost always mounted equatorially— that is, the telescope-tube is attached to an axis, which itself is carried by another axis with its bearings so arranged that it points toward the pole. This principal axis is called the polar axis, and a clockwork is usually arranged to make it turn at the rate of one revolution in a sidereal day. When the telescope is once pointed at a celestial object, the clockwork will keep it apparently stationary in the field of view for any length of time. By the help also of graduated circles attached to the two axes it is easy to "set" the telescope so as to find any object whose right ascension and declination are known. See the supplement.

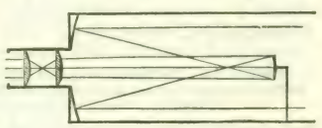

Fig. 4.— The Gregorian Reflecting Telescope.

The credit of the discovery of the telescope has been a fruitful subject of discussion. . . . It is quite certain that previous to 1600 the telescope was unknown, except possibly to individuals who failed to see its practical importance, and who confined its use to "curious practices" or to demonstrations of "natural magic."

telespectroscope (tel-ē-spek'trō-skōp), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + E. spectroscope.] An instrument consisting of an astronomical telescope with a spectroscope attached: so designated by Lockyer.

telestereoscope (tel-ē-ster'ē-ō-skōp), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + E. stereoscope.] An optical instrument devised by Helmholtz for producing an appearance of relief in the objects of a landscape at a great distance. Helmholtz's instrument consists of two plane mirrors set at an angle of 45°, and some distance apart. The rays from the objects of the landscape falling upon these mirrors are reflected to two plane mirrors placed parallel to the first and in front of the eyes. The observer views the image reflected from the first set of mirrors.

telestic (tē-les'tik), a. [< Gr. τελεστικός, fit for finishing or consecrating, < τελεῖν, finish, complete, < τέλος, end.] Pertaining to the final end or purpose; tending or serving to end or finish.

> I . . . call this the telestick or mystic operation; which is conversant about the purgation of the lucid or ethereal vehicle. Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 792.

telestich (tel'ē-stik), n. [< Gr. τέλος, end, + στίχος, a row, a line, a verse: see stich.] A poem in which the final letters of the lines make a name.

telethermograph (tel-ē-thėr'mō-grȧf), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + E. thermograph.] A thermograph which records at a distance the indications of its actuating thermometer; a self-registering telethermometer.

telethermometer (tel″ē-thėr-mom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + E. thermometer.] A thermometer that records its temperature at a distance. In general, the actuating instrument is a metallic thermometer whose indicator is connected electrically with a dial and pointer, or with a continuous chronographic register, at the place where the record is desired. The apparatus connected with the thermometer is called the transmitter, and that connected with the register is called the receiver. Of various systems, the following one of Richard Bros. of Paris may be described. Over the pointer of the thermometer-dial is placed an auxiliary needle which carries a fork at its extremity. The arms of the fork are so placed that the primary pointer of the instrument rests between them. Thus, the motion of the pointer of the instrument is limited by the fork, and an electric contact is made when the pointer, responding to a change of temperature, touches either arm of the fork. The arms are insolated from each other, and separate wires carry the electric current from the two arms to the receiver. The two currents, therefore, distinguish rising and falling temperatures. At the receiver the current sets in motion a train of wheelwork, which moves the registering pen of a chronograph-barrel exactly one scale-division. The displacement is upward or downward according as the electric current is due to a rising or a falling temperature. Simultaneously the wheelwork plunges a metal weight into a cup of mercury, and closes an electric current independent of the first. The current thus established returns to the transmitter, and acts on a magnet whose function it is to move the auxiliary needle bearing the fork so as to bring the two arms of the fork again to equal distances from the primary needle. The apparatus is completed by an automatic interrupter, which operates after each return of the current from the receiver. The instrument is then in readiness to record another differential change of temperature. This system of electrical registration at a distance is applicable to any instrument whose indications are shown by a dial and pointer.

telethermometry (tel″ē-thėr-mom'e-tri), n. [As telethermometer + -y[3].] The art of indicating or recording temperature automatically at a distance from the actuating thermometer.

teletopometer (tel″ē-tō-pom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + τόπος, a place, + μέτρον, measure.] A telemeter in which two telescopes are used.

teleutoform (tē-lū'tō-fôrm), n. [< Gr. τελευτή, completion, + L. forma, form.] In bot., the last or final fruit-form in the alternating generations of the Uredinales; the stage in which the teleutospores are formed.

teleutogonidium (tē-lū″tō-gō-nid'i-um), n.; pl. teleutogonidia (-ȧ). [NL., < Gr. τελευτή, completion, + NL. gonidium.] In bot., same as teleutospore.

teleutospore (tē-lū'tō-spōr), n. [NL., < Gr. τελευτή, completion, + σπορά, seed: see spore.] In bot., in the Uredinales, a thick-walled spore formed by abscission on a branch of the mycelium (sterigma), and on germination producing a promycelium. In some cases the teleutospores are produced early in the season, but usually they appear in autumn, remain attached to the tissues of the host over winter, and germinate in the spring. See spore[2], Uredinales, and cut under Puccinia. Also called brand-spore.

> The cycle begins in spring with the germination of thick-walled spores, called teleutospores, borne usually in pairs at the end of sterigmata. Encyc. Brit., IX. 831.

telfordize (tel'ford-īz), v.; pret. and pp. telfordized, ppr. telfordizing. In road-making, to construct according to the method of road-making invented by Thomas Telford. See Telford pavement.

Telford pavement. A roadway devised by the Scotch engineer Thomas Telford (1757–1834). The bottoming of the road consists of any durable stone, from 4 to 7 inches in dimensions, hand-laid upon the road-foundation. Between such stones smaller pieces are packed to complete a compact layer 7 inches deep in the middle of the road, and graduated to 4 inches in depth at the sides, to produce a uniform convexity. Upon this is spread, and rolled down, gravel composed of flints, the pieces being as nearly cubical in form as can be obtained, and none weighing more than six ounces. The rolling is continued till the surface is crushed and compacted to smoothness. The name is often contracted to telford.

telic (tel'ik), a. [< Gr. τελικός, final, < τέλος, end, completion.] Noting a final end or purpose. See ecbatic.

teliconograph (tel-ī-kon'ō-grȧf), n. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + εἰκών, an image, + γράφειν, write. Cf. iconograph.] Same as teleiconograph.

Telifera (tē-lif'e-rä), n. pl. [NL., < L. tela, web, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Same as Epithelaria.

Telinga (te-ling'gä), n. 1. One of the people living in the eastern part of the Deccan. Yule and Burnell.—2†. [l. c.] A sepoy.—Telinga potato. See potato.

tell[1] (tel), v.; pret. and pp. told (formerly or dial. sometimes telled, telt), ppr. telling. [< ME. tellen (pret. tolde, talde, pp. told, itold, talden, ytold), < AS. tellan (pret. tealde, pp. geteald) = OS. tellian = OFries. tella = MD. D. tellen, count, reckon, consider, = MLG. tellen = OHG. zellan, MHG. zeln, G. zählen, number (erzählen, narrate), = Icel. telja = Sw. tälja = Dan. tælle, number, tell; cf. Goth. talzjan, instruct, direct; from the noun represented by tale[1]: see tale[1], n. Cf. tale[1], v. For the forms tell, told, cf. sell, sold.]

I. trans. 1. To number; count; enumerate; reckon one by one, or one after another: as, to tell a hundred; to tell one's beads.

Certeyn I hem never tolde;
For as fele eyen hadde she
As fetheres upon foules be.
Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 1380.

His custom was to tell over his herd of sea-calves at noon, and then to sleep. Bacon, Physical Fables, vii.

He cannot be so innocent a coxcomb;
He can tell ten, sure.
Beau. and Fl., Coxcomb, ii. 1.

Nobody comes to visit him, he receives no letters, and tells his money morning and evening.
Steele, Spectator, No. 264.

2. To recount; rehearse; narrate; relate: as, to tell a story.

Witnesse, ye Heavens, the truth of all that I have teld!
Spenser, F. Q., VII. vi. 27.

Life . . . is a tale
Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, Signifying nothing. Shak., Macbeth, v. 5. 27.

Masters, I have to tell a tale of woe,
A tale of folly and of wasted life.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 5.

3. To make known; divulge; disclose; reveal; communicate: as, to tell a secret; to tell one's errand.

Now wul y telle the rygt Way to Jerusalem.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 125.

Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon. 2 Sam. i. 20.

She never told her love,
But let concealment, like a worm i' the bud,
Feed on her damask cheek. Shak., T. N., ii. 4. 113.

I wonder wha 's tauld that gay ladie
The fashion into our countrie.
Lord Dingwall (Child's Ballads, I. 290).

4. To declare; say.

Who-so contrarieth treuthe he telleth in the gospel
That God knoweth hym nouȝte, ne no seynte of heuene.
Piers Plowman (B), v. 55.

5. To put or express in words; recite; explain; make clear or plain.

And dede men for that deon [dip] comen oute of deope graues,
And tolden why that tempest so longe tyme durede.
Piers Plowman (C), xxi. 66.

I know, quoth he, what it meaneth, but I cannot tell it; I cannot express it.
Latimer, 2d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1550.

Whoso ask'd her for his wife,
His riddle told not, lost his life.
Shak., Pericles, i., Prol., l. 38.

Few can tell his pedigree,
Nor his subtill nature conster.
Marston and Barksted, Insatiate Countess, v.

6. To discern so as to be able to say; distinguish; recognize; decide; determine: as, to tell one from another; she cannot tell which she likes best.

I could always tell if visitors had called in my absence.
Thoreau, Walden, p. 141.

7. To inform.

He seith that ye be sone aperceyvaunte of hym, and that ye sholde telle me what he is.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 74.

Tell me, good Hobbinoll, what garres thee greete?
Spenser, Shep. Cal., April.

I'll tell you as we pass along,
That you will wonder what hath fortuned.
Shak., T. G. of V., v. 4. 168.

8. To give an order, command, or direction to; order; bid: as, I told him to stay at home.

Call for your casting-bottle, and place your mirror in your hat, as I told you. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, ii. 1.

It may be accepted as necessary for the comfort of all coachmen that a team should never start until told.
New York Tribune, May 11, 1890.

9. To assure; assert positively to.

They are burs, I can tell you. Shak., T. and C., iii. 2. 120.

Pshaw! I tell you 'tis no such thing—you are the man she wants, and nobody but you.
Sheridan, The Duenna, ii. 4.

Let me tell you, you may drink worse French wine in many taverns in London than they have sometimes at this house. Cotton, in Walton's Angler, ii. 227.

10†. To make account of: in phrases such as to tell no tale, to tell no dainty, to tell no store.

Vesselle of Sylver is there non: for thei telle no prys there of, to make no Vesselle offe.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 220.

I ne tolde no deyntee of hir love.
Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 208.

Tell that to the marines. See marine.—To tell noses. See nose[1].—To tell no store of†. See store[3].—To tell off, to count off; especially, to count off and detach, as for some special duty: as, a squad was told off to clear the streets.—To tell one's beads. See to bid beads, under bead.—To tell one's fortune, or to tell fortunes. See fortune.—To tell one's own tale or story, to tell tale†, to tell tales out of school. See tale[1].—Syn. 3. To impart, report, repeat, mention, recite, publish.—4. Speak, State, etc. See say[1].—7. To acquaint (with), apprise (of).

II. intrans. 1. To give an account; make report; speak; explain: with of.

Bothe of yonge and olde
Ful wel byloved, and wel folk of hire tolde.
Chaucer, Troilus, i. 131.

That I may publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and tell of all thy wondrous works. Ps. xxvi. 7.

This ancient and isolated city [Ragusa] has yet something more to tell of. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 240.

Of the fruitful year
They told, and its delights.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 392.

2. To say; declare.

For hit aren murye-mouthede men mynstrales of heuene,
And godes boyes, bordiours as the bok telleth.
Piers Plowman (C), x. 127.

3. To talk; chat; gossip. [Prov. Eng.]

While I've been telling with you, here've this little maid been and ate up all my sugar!
Kingsley, Westward Ho, xxx.

4. To tell tales; play the informer; inform; blab: with of or on before the person: as, if you do, I'll tell. [Now colloq.]

And David saved neither man nor woman alive, to bring tidings to Gath, saying, Lest they should tell on us, saying, So did David. 1 Sam. xxvii. 11.

He didn't want to tell on Maggie, though he was angry with her; for Tom Tulliver was a lad of honor.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, i. 5.

5. To act effectively; produce a marked effect or impression; count for something.

It 's true, every year will tell upon him. He is over five-and-forty, you know. George Eliot, Middlemarch, iv.

It would seem that even pedantry and antiquarianism are welcomed when they tell on behalf of the other side.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 42.

Everybody knows that speeches are little, that debates are often nothing, in Congress and elsewhere; but votes tell. It is the vote that men want.
Bibliotheca Sacra, XLVII. 544.

To hear tell of. See hear.

tell[1] (tel), n. [< tell[1], v.] That which is told; account; narration; story; tale. [Rare.]

There, I am at the end of my tell! If I write on, it must be to ask questions. Walpole, To Mann, April 4, 1743.

Little Barb'ry 's the very flower of the flock, accordin' to my tell. E. Eggleston, The Century, XXXV. 44.

tell[2] (tel), n. [< Ar. tell, a hill.] A hill or mound: common in Oriental place-names.

The east bank of the Tigris, where gigantic tells or artificial mounds, and the traces of an ancient city wall, bore evident witness of fallen greatness.
Encyc. Brit., XVII. 511.

tellable (tel'a-bl), a. [< tell[1] + -able.] Capable of being told; worth telling.

tell-bill-willy (tel'bil-wil''i), n. [Imitative.] The willet, Symphemia semipalmata. See cuts under willet and semipalmate. [Bahamas.]

tell-clock† (tel'klok), n. [< tell[1], v., + obj. clock[2].] One who sits and counts the hours; an idler.

Is there no mean between busybodies and tell-clocks, between factotums and faineants?
Rev. S. Ward, Sermons, p. 131.

telled (teld). An obsolete or provincial preterit of tell[1].

tellen (tel'en), n. [< Sp. telina = F. telline, < NL. Tellina, < Gr. τελλίνη, a kind of shell-fish: see Tellina.] A bivalve of the genus Tellina or of ★some of the related Tellinidæ. P. P. Carpenter.

teller (tel'ėr), n. [< ME. tellere; < tell[1] + -er[1].] 1. One who counts or enumerates. Specifically—(a) One of two or more persons, members of a deliberative or legislative body, appointed, when a division takes place, to count the votes cast for and against a particular proposal or measure. In the British House of Commons there are two tellers appointed for each party, of whom one for the ayes and another for the noes are associated to check each other in the telling. In the United States House of Representatives but one is appointed for each party. (b) One of four officers (styled talliers in old records) formerly employed in the British Exchequer to receive money payable to the king and to pay money payable by the king. The office was abolished in 1834 by 4 and 5 Will. IV., c. 15, and the duties of the four tellers are now performed by a controller-general of the receipt and issue of the Exchequer. See tallier.

Sir Edward [Carey] was a gentleman of the Chamber, and one of the four Tellers of the Exchequer.
H. Hall, Society in Elizabethan Age, ix.

(c) A functionary in a banking establishment whose business it is to receive or to pay money over the counter: as, a receiving teller; a paying teller.

2. One who tells, recounts, narrates, relates, or communicates something to others: as, a story-teller.

Sr Kenelm was a teller of strange things.
Evelyn, Diary, June 18, 1670.

It is as Zara that the city is famous, because it is as Zara that its name appears in the pages of the great English teller of the tale. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 121.

tellership (tel'ėr-ship), n. [< teller + -ship.] The office or post of teller; a position as teller.

tellevast, n. See talevas.

Tellicherry bark. See conessi bark, under bark[2].

Tellina (te-lī'nä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1758), < Gr. τελλίνη, a kind of shell-fish.] In conch., a genus of bivalve mollusks, typical of the family Tellinidæ. The shell has a strong external ligament; it is generally thin and handsomely colored. The animal has very long siphons. There are many species, both living and extinct, of all coasts. See also cut under Tellinidæ.

Tellina lingua-felis (right valve).

telling (tel'ing), a. Effective; impressive; striking: as, a telling speech on tariff reform.

Not Latimer, not Luther, struck more telling blows against false theology than did this brave singer.
Emerson, Robert Burns.

telling-house (tel'ing-hous), n. One of the rude cots in which shepherds on the moor meet at the end of the pasturing season, to tell or count their sheep. R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, ii., note. [Prov. Eng.]

tellingly (tel'ing-li), adv. In a telling manner; so as to be effective; effectively.

The doctrine that poetry, not philosophy, is the true interpretation of life, is put tellingly and persuasively.
The Academy, Dec. 1, 1888, p. 345.

Tellinidæ (te-lin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tellina + -idæ.] A family of bivalve mollusks, of which the genus Tellina is the type. The animal has the mantle-lobes wide open in front, but continued into very long, separate siphons behind; the labial palpi are large and triangular; the gills are united behind and appendiculate; the foot is tongue-shaped and compressed. The shell is nearly equivalve, and generally has cardinal and anterior and posterior lateral teeth.

Tellina radiata.

tellinite (tel'i-nīt), n. [< Tellina + -ite[2].] A fossil shell of the genus Tellina, or some similar ★one; a petrified tellen.

telltale (tel'tāl), n. and a. [< tell[1], v., + obj. tale[1].] I. n. 1. One who officiously or heedlessly communicates information concerning the private affairs of others; one who tells that which is supposed to be secret or private; a blabber; an informer; a tale-bearer.

One that quarrells with no man, but for not pledging him, but takes all absurdities, and commits as many, and is no tell-tale next morning though hee remember it.
Bp. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, An Ordinairie Honest [Fellow.

If you see your master wronged by any of your fellow-servants, be sure to conceal it, for fear of being called a tell-tale. Swift, Advice to Servants (General Directions).

The children, who are always house tell-tales, soon made him acquainted with the little history of the house and family. Thackeray, Henry Esmond, xi.

2. An indication or an indicator; that which serves to convey information.

Paint those eyes, so blue, so kind,
Eager telltales of her mind.
M. Arnold, A Memory-Picture.

3. A name given to a variety of instruments or devices, usually automatic, used for counting, indicating, registering, or otherwise giving desired information. Specifically—(a) In organ-building, a piece of bone, metal, or wood, moving in a slot, which is so connected with the bellows as to indicate to the blower or player by its position the state of the wind-supply. (b) A hanging compass, generally in the cabin of the commanding officer. (c) An index near the wheel of a ship to show the position of the tiller. (d) A turnstile placed at the entrance of a public hall or other place of resort, and having a mechanism which records the number of persons passing in or out. (e) A gage or index which shows the pressure of steam on an engine-boiler, of gas on a gas-holder, and the like. (f) A clock-attachment for the purpose of recording the presence of a watchman at certain intervals. Some forms of this device are provided with a rotating paper dial, showing the hour and minute at which a watchman touched a projecting button communicating by a point with the paper dial. (g) A small overflow-pipe attached to a tank or cistern to indicate when it is full. (h) A bar to which are attached strips of leather, set at a proper height over a railway track to warn brakemen on freight-trains when they are approaching a bridge.

4. In ornith., a tattler; a bird of the genus Totanus in a broad sense: as, the greater and lesser telltale, Totanus melanoleucus and T. flavipes. See tattler, and cut under yellowlegs.

II. a. 1. Disposed to tell or reveal secrets, whether officiously or heedlessly; given to betraying the confidences or revealing the private affairs of others; blabbing: as, telltale people.

Let not the heavens hear these tell-tale women Rail on the Lord's anointed.
Shak., Rich. III., iv. 4. 149.

2. Showing, revealing, or denoting that which is not intended to be known, apparent, or proclaimed: as, telltale tears; telltale blushes.

The telltale snow, a sparkling mould,
Says where they go and whence they came;
Lightly they touch its carpet cold,
And where they touch they sign your name.
F. Locker, Winter Fantasy.

3. That gives warning or intimation of something: as, a telltale pipe attached to a cistern or tank.—Telltale clock. See clock[2].

tell-truth†, n. Same as tell-truth.

tell-truth† (tel'trōth), n. [Also tell-troth; < tell[1], v., + obj. truth.] One who speaks or tells the truth; one who gives a true account or report; a veracious or candid person.

Caleb and Joshua, the only two tell-troths, endeavoured to undeceive and encourage the people.
Fuller, Pisgah Sight, II. iv. 3. (Trench.)

The rudeness of a Macedonian tell-truth is no apparent calumny. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 99.

tellural (tel'ū-ral), a. [< L. tellus (tellur-), the earth, + -al.] Of or pertaining to the earth.

tellurate (tel'ū-rāt), n. [< tellur(ic) + -ate[1].] A salt of telluric acid.

tellur-bismuth (tel'ėr-biz″muth), n. [< tellur(ium) + bismuth.] Same as tetradymite.

telluret (tel'ū-ret), n. [< tellur(ium) + -et.] Same as telluride.

tellureted, telluretted (tel'ū-ret-ed), a. [< tellur(ium) + -et + -ed[2].] Combined with tellurium.—Tellureted hydrogen, H_2Te, a gaseous compound obtained by the action of hydrochloric acid on an alloy of tellurium. It is a feeble acid, analogous in composition, smell, and other characters to sulphureted hydrogen.

tellurian (te-lū'ri-an), a. and n. [< L. tellus (tellur-), the earth, + -i-an.] I. a. Pertaining, relating to, or characteristic of the earth or an inhabitant of the earth.

They absolutely hear the tellurian lungs wheezing, panting, crying "Bellows to mend" periodically, as the Earth approaches her aphelion.
De Quincey, System of the Heavens. (Davies.)

II. n. 1. An inhabitant of the earth: so called with reference to supposed inhabitants of other planets.

If any distant worlds (which may be the case) are so far ahead of us Tellurians in optical resources as to see distinctly through their telescopes all that we do on earth, what is the grandest sight to which we ever treat them?
De Quincey, Joan of Arc. (Davies.)

2. Same as tellurion.

telluric (te-lū'rik), a. [= F. tellurique = Sp. telúrico, < L. tellus (tellur-), the earth.] 1. Pertaining to or proceeding from the earth: as, a disease of telluric origin; telluric deities.

How the Coleridge moonshine comported itself amid these hot telluric flames . . . must be left to conjecture.
Carlyle, Sterling, i. 10. (Davies.)

His [man's] knowledge, his ideas, his treasures of art and literature, have a sensuous origin, just as this fruit has a mineral or telluric origin. The Century, XIX. 690.

2. Of, containing, or derived from tellurium: as, telluric acid.—Telluric acid, H_2TeO_4, an acid of tellurium which is formed when barium tellurate is treated with sulphuric acid. It forms a white powder soluble in hot water.—Telluric bismuth, the mineral tetradymite.—Telluric silver, hessite.

telluride (tel'ū-rid or -rīd), n. [< tellur-ium + -ide[2].] A compound of tellurium with an electropositive element. Also called telluret.

telluriferous (tel-ū-rif'e-rus), a. [< telluri-um + L. ferre = E. bear[1].] Containing or yielding tellurium.

tellurion (te-lū'ri-on), n. [Also tellurian; < L. tellus (tellur-) + -i-on.] An instrument for showing in what manner the causes operate which produce the succession of day and night and the changes of the seasons: a kind of orrery.

tellurism (tel'ū-rizm), n. [< L. tellus (tellur-), the earth, + -ism.] See the quotation.

There is in magnetism two different actions—one which depends upon a vital principle spread throughout nature, and circulating in all bodies; the other the same principle, modified by man, animated by his spirit, directed by his will. He thinks that the first sort of magnetism, which he calls tellurism, or siderism, can be, etc.
Deleuze, Anim. Magn. (trans. 1843), p. 209.

tellurite (tel'ū-rīt), n. [< tellur(ous) + -ite[2].] 1. In chem., a compound of tellurous acid and a base.—2. In mineral., tellurium dioxid, a mineral found in small yellowish or whitish spherical masses, having a radiated structure, occurring with native tellurium.

tellurium (te-lū'ri-um), n. [NL., < L. tellus (tellur-), the earth.] Chemical symbol, Te; atomic weight, 127.5. One of the rarer elements, occurring in nature in small quantity in the native state and also in combination with various metals, as with gold and silver in the form of graphic tellurium, or sylvanite, with gold, lead, and antimony as nagyagite, and in several other mostly very rare mineral combinations. Tellurium is a brittle substance. Its specific gravity is about 6.2. Its chemical properties have made it a problem from an early time, and it was first called aurum paradoxum and metallum problematicum. That it was not identical with any metal previously known was demonstrated by Klaproth in 1798. Tellurium, although having a decided metallic luster, and occurring in nature almost exclusively in combination with decided metallic elements, most closely resembles sulphur and selenium in its chemical reactions, and is generally classed at the present time among the non-metallic elements, although considered by Berzelius as being a metal.—Foliated tellurium. Same as nagyagite.—Graphic tellurium. Same as sylvanite.

tellurium-glance (te-lū'ri-um-glans), n. Same as nagyagite.

tellurize (tel'ū-rīz), v. t. To mix or cause to combine with tellurium.—Tellurized ores, ores which contain tellurium compounds.

tellurous (tel'ū-rus), a. [< tellur-ium + -ous.] Of, pertaining to, or obtained from tellurium.—Tellurous acid, H_2TeO_3, an oxygen acid of tellurium, analogous to selenious acid, and, like it, formed by the action of nitric acid on the element. It is a white powder, slightly soluble in water.

Telmatodytes (tel-ma-tod'i-tēz), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1850), < Gr. τέλμα(τ-), a marsh, + δύτης, diver.] A genus of true wrens, or subgenus of Cistothorus, under which is often named the common long-billed marsh-wren of the United States, C. or T. palustris. See cut under marsh-wren.

telodynamic (tel″ō-dī-nam'ik), a. [< Gr. τῆλε, afar, + δύναμις, power: see dynamic.] In mech., elect., etc., relating to or used in the transmission of power from or to a distance.

The mechanical method of traction by means of the telodynamic cable is preferable to any electric system.
The Engineer, LXVII. 9.

telolecithal (tel-ō-les'i-thal), a. [< Gr. τέλος, end, + λέκιθος, the yolk of an egg.] In embryol., having much food-yolk which is eccentric from the formative yolk, as the large meroblastic eggs of birds: correlated with alecithal (having no food-yolk) and centrolecithal (which see).

The classification of animal eggs proposed by Balfour is adopted: viz., alecithal, telolecithal, and centrolecithal.
Nature, XXXVII. 507.

telopore (tel'ō-pōr), n. [< Gr. τέλος, end, + πόρος, pore.] In embryol., a terminal pore left by the closing from before backward of the median furrow produced by the invagination of mesoderm in the embryo of some insects.
Patten, Quart. Jour. Micros. Sci., XXXI. 639.

telotroch (tel'ō-trok), n. Same as telotrocha.

telotrocha (te-lot'rō-kä), n.; pl. telotrochæ (-kē). [NL.: see telotrochous.] The ciliated embryo of polychætous annelids, having a circle of cilia around the body just in front of the mouth and behind the eyes, on the segment which becomes the prætomium. There is also usually in such embryos another circlet of cilia around the caudal end of the body, and a tuft upon the center of the prætomium. See atrocha, mesotrocha. Also, irregularly, teleotrocha.

telotrochal (te-lot'rō-kal), a. [< telotroch-ous + -al.] Same as telotrochous. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 137.

telotrochous (te-lot'rō-kus), a. [< Gr. τέλος, end, + τροχός, a wheel: see trochus.] Surrounded by terminal cilia, as an annelidous larva; having the character of a telotrocha. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 171.

telotype (tel'ō-tīp), n. [Irreg. < Gr. τῆλε, afar, + τύπος, type.] 1. A printing electric telegraph.—2. An automatically printed telegram.

telpher (tel'fėr), a. [Irreg. < tel(egraph) + Gr. φέρειν, carry, = E. bear[1]. Cf. telpherage.] Of or relating to a system of telpherage.

telpherage (tel'fėr-āj), n. [< telpher + -age.] Transportation effected automatically by the aid of electricity; specifically, a system of electric locomotion especially adapted to the transfer of goods, in which the carriages are suspended from electric conductors supported on poles. Every carriage or train of carriages contains an electric motor, which takes the current from the conductors upon which it runs.

This word "telpherage" . . . is intended to designate all modes of transport effected automatically with the aid of electricity. According to strict rules of derivation, the word would be "telephorage"; but in order to avoid confusion with "telephone," and to get rid of the double accent in one word, which is disagreeable to my ear, I have ventured to give the new word such a form as it might have received after a few centuries of usage by English tongues, and to substitute the English sounding "telpher" for "telephore." In the most general sense, telpher lines include such electric railway lines as were first proposed by my colleagues, Messrs. Ayrton and Perry. The word would also describe lines, such as I have seen proposed in the newspapers, for the conveyance of small parcels at extremely rapid rates. But to-night I shall confine myself entirely to the one specific form in which the telpher line first presented itself to my mind, and which it has fallen to my lot to develop. In this form telpher lines are adapted for the conveyance of minerals and other goods at a slow pace and at a cheap rate.
Fleeming Jenkin, Jour. Soc. of Arts (1884), XXXII. 648.

telpherway (tel'fėr-wā), n. The road, line, or way on which transportation by the system of telpherage is carried on.

telson (tel'son), n. [NL., < Gr. τέλσον, a boundary, limit.] In zoöl., the last segment, or an azygous appendage of the last segment, or the median axis of the last segment, whether in one piece or more, of certain crustaceans and arachnidans, as the middle flipper of a lobster's tail-fin, the long sharp tail of a horseshoe-crab, and the sting of a scorpion. In long-tailed crustaceans a broad flat telson combines with similar swimmerets to form the rhipidura. In some thysanurous insects the telson is a small plate at the end of the abdomen, and is either a modified segment or, more probably, a median azygous appendage. See cuts under Amphithoë, Eurypterida, horseshoe-crab, scorpion, and Squillidæ.

telt. An obsolete or provincial preterit of tell[1].

Telugu (tel'ö-gö), n. [Also Teloogoo; < Telugu Telugu, also Telunga, Telinga, etc., < Telingā, one of the people of the country called Teliñgāna or Tilingana.] The language of the district in the east of the Deccan inhabited by the Telingas: a Dravidian dialect. Also used adjectively.

temenos (tem'e-nos), n.; pl. temene (-nē). [< Gr. τέμενος, a piece of land marked off, a sacred inclosure, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut: see tome. Cf. temple[1].] In Gr. antiq., a sacred inclosure or precinct; a piece of land marked off from common uses and dedicated to a god; a precinct, usually surrounded by a barrier, allotted to a temple or sanctuary, or consecrated for any other reason.

The building was surrounded with a wall of brick forming a court or temenos. Encyc. Brit., II. 388.

Temenuchus (tem-e-nū'kus), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1850), so called as occupying pagodas in India; < Gr. τεμενοῦχος, holding a piece of land (a sacred inclosure), < τέμενος, a piece of land, a sacred inclosure (see temenos), + ἔχειν, have, hold.] A genus of Old World starlings, with exposed nostrils, a bare postocular area, and an enormous crest of lanceolate feathers overhanging the back of the neck. The only species is T. pagodarum, the pagoda-thrush of Latham, originally described as "Brahm's martin" by Sonnini in 1782, which extends from Afghanistan to Ceylon, and is a well-known bird of the whole peninsula of India. The male is 8½ inches long, the wing 4, the tail 2¾. The general color is lavender-gray, varied with black, white, and cinnamon; the long crest is greenish-black, the feet are yellow, and the eyes are white. The female is similar, but rather smaller and with a shorter crest. See cut on following page.

Shak., Cymbeline, v. 5. 250.

2. To combine in due proportions; constitute; adjust; fit.

But God hath tempered the body together: . . . that there should be no schism in the body, but that the members should have the same care one for another.
1 Cor. xii. 24, 25.

Who of us can live content, as we are tempered, without some hero to admire and worship?
H. Bushnell, Sermons for New Life, p. 57.

Either this being should not have been made mortal, or mortal existence should have been tempered to his qualities. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, ix.

3. To moisten, mix, and work up into proper consistency; prepare by moistening, mixing, or kneading.

After the clay has been allowed to "mellow, or ripen," in pits, under water, it is passed through the pug-mill and well kneaded or tempered. Ure, Dict., III. 997.

To temper clay means to mix it thoroughly, and prepare it for the use of the moulder, who must have it in a condition not too soft nor yet too hard, but in a suitable state of plasticity to be easily and solidly moulded into bricks.
C. T. Davis, Bricks and Tiles, p. 106.

4. To modify or qualify by blending: as, to temper indignation with pity.

I shall temper so Justice with mercy as may illustrate most Them fully satisfied, and thee appease.
Milton, P. L., x. 77.

The young and happy are not ill pleased to temper their life with a transparent shadow.
Hawthorne, Seven Gables, ix.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, iii. 24.

9. To bring to a proper degree of hardness and elasticity for use, as steel or other metal. Steel is tempered by being first heated to a high temperature, and then rapidly cooled; it is then reheated to the desired temperature, and cooled again. The surface of steel when thus reheated undergoes a regular succession of changes of color, and these indicate exactly when the process is to be stopped in order that the right hardness may be secured. The following table exhibits the order of succession of the colors shown by the steel in tempering, also the degree of the thermometer at which that color appears, and some of the articles for which that especial hardness is best suited:

Temperature.	Color.	Article.
430	Very pale yellow	Lancets.
450	Straw-yellow	Razors and surgical instruments.
490	Brownish yellow	Scissors, chisels.
510	Purplish brown	Axes, planes.
530	Purple	Table cutlery.
550	Light blue	Springs, saws.
560	Dark blue	Fine saws, augers.
600	Blackish blue	Hand-saws.

Our men that went to discouer those parts had but two iron pickaxes with them, and those so ill tempered that the points turned againe at euery stroake; but triall was made of the Oare, with argument of much hope.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 761.

The temper'd metals clash, and yield a silver sound.
Dryden, Æneid, viii. 699.

10†. To dispose.

'Tis she
That tempers him to this extremity.
Shak., Rich. III., i. 1. 65.

II. intrans. 1†. To accord; keep agreement.

Few men rightly temper with the stars.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iv. 6. 29.

2. To become soft and plastic; be molded; acquire a desired quality or state.

I have him already tempering between my finger and my ★thumb. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 3. 140.

temper (tem′pėr), n. [= It. tempera, tempra, temper, kind, sort, tempera; from the verb.] 1. Mixture or combination of different ingredients or qualities, especially in the way and the proportions best suited for some specific purpose: as, the temper of mortar.—2. Constitution; consistency; form; definite state or condition.

Yorick was just bringing my father's hypothesis to some temper. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, ix. 32.

3†. Temperament.

The exquisiteness of his [Christ's] bodily temper increased the exquisiteness of his torment.
Fuller, Pisgah Sight, I. 345. (Trench.)

4. Disposition of mind; frame of mind; inclination; humor; mood: as, a calm temper; a hasty temper; a sullen or a fretful temper.

A creature of a most perfect and divine temper; one in whom the humours and elements are peaceably met, without emulation of precedency.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, ii. 1.

Grave Henry hath succeeded him in all things, and is a gallant Gentleman, of a French Education and Temper.
Howell, Letters, I. iv. 15.

Such as have a knowledge of the town may easily class themselves with tempers congenial to their own.
Goldsmith, Various Clubs.

It may readily be imagined how little such thwarting agrees with the old cavalier's fiery temper.
Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 388.

5†. Calmness of mind; temperateness; moderation; self-restraint; tranquillity; good temper.

You are too suspicious,
And I have borne too much beyond my temper.
Fletcher, Double Marriage, i. 1.

The Emperor heard the Heralds with great Temper, and answered Clarencieux very mildly.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 275.

How could I think with temper of passing my days among Yahoos? Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iv. 10.

6. Heat of mind or passion; irritation; disposition to give way to anger, resentment, or the like: as, he showed a great deal of temper.—7. Middle character or course; mean or medium; compromise. [Obsolete or archaic.]

A temper between [the opinions of] France and Oxford.
John Hampden, quoted by Macaulay, Nugent's Hampden.

They made decrees of toleration, and appointed tempers and expedients to be drawn up by discreet persons.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 297.

The perfect lawgiver is a just temper between the mere man of theory, who can see nothing but general principles, and the mere man of business, who can see nothing but particular circumstances. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xi.

8. The state of a metal, particularly as to its hardness and elasticity: as, the temper of iron or steel.

His fears were vain; impenetrable charms
Secur'd the temper of th' ethereal arms.
Pope, Iliad, xx. 315.

9. In sugar-works, white lime or other alkaline substance stirred into a clarifier filled with cane-juice, to neutralize the excess of acid.—Good temper, freedom from passion or irritability; good nature.—Out of temper, in bad temper; irritated.—To keep one's temper, to avoid becoming angry or irritated; control one's temper.

> But easier 'tis to learn how Bets to lay
> Than how to keep your Temper while you play.
> Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love, iii.

To lose one's temper, to become angry.

tempera (tem'pe-rä), n. [It.: see temper.] In painting, same as distemper[2].

Tempera, or Distemper, is a method of painting in which solid pigments are employed, mixed with a water medium in which some kind of gum or gelatinous substance is dissolved to prevent the colours from scaling off. Tempera is called in Italy "fresco a secco," as distinguished from "fresco buono," or true fresco, painted on freshly laid patches of stucco. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 157.

temperable (tem'pėr-ạ-bl), a. [< temper + -able.] Capable of being tempered.

> Do not the constructive fingers of Watt, Fulton, Whittemore, Arkwright predict the fusible, hard, and temperable texture of metals? Emerson, History.

temperament (tem'pėr-ạ-ment), n. [< F. tempérament = Sp. Pg. It. temperamento, < L. temperamentum, due proportion, proper measure, < temperare, modify, proportion: see temper.] 1. State with respect to the relative proportion of qualities or constituent parts; constitution; mixture of opposite or different qualities; a condition resulting from the blending of various qualities.

> The common law has wasted and wrought out those distempers, and reduced the kingdom to its just state and temperament. Sir M. Hale.

2. That individual peculiarity of physical organization by which the manner of acting, feeling, and thinking of every person is permanently affected: as, a phlegmatic temperament; a sanguine temperament; the artistic temperament. Certain temperamental types have long been recognized (see the phrases below); they may serve the purposes of description, but do not represent any very well marked natural groups.

3. A middle course or an arrangement reached by mutual concession, as by a tempering of extreme claims on either side; adjustment of conflicting influences, as passions, interests, or doctrines, or the means by which such adjustment is effected; compromise.

> I forejudge not any probable expedient, any temperament that can be found in things of this nature, so disputable on either side. Milton, Free Commonwealth.
> Auricular confession . . . was left to each man's discretion in the new order: a judicious temperament, which the reformers would have done well to adopt in some other points. Hallam, Const. Hist., I. 88.

4†. Condition as to heat or cold; temperature.

> Bodies are denominated hot and cold in proportion to the present temperament of that part of our body to which they are applied. Locke, Hem. of Nat. Phil., xi.
> Madeira is a fertile island, and the different heights and situations among its mountains afford such temperaments of air that all the fruits of northern and southern countries are produced there.
> B. Franklin, Autobiography, p. 313.

5. In music, the principle or system of tuning in accordance with which the tones of an instrument of fixed intonation are tuned, or those of the voice or of an instrument of free intonation are modulated in a given case. The relative pitch of the tones of an ideal scale may be fixed with mathematical precision. An instrument tuned so as to produce such a scale, or a voice or instrument using the intervals of such a scale, is said to be tuned or modulated in pure or just temperament. So long as these tones only are used, no further adjustment is necessary. But if modulation be attempted, so that some other tone than the original one becomes the key-note, one or more intercalary tones are required, and the relative pitch of some of the original tones has to be altered. To fit an instrument for varied modulations, therefore, either a large number of separate tones must be provided for, or the pitch of some of them must be slightly modified, so that a single tone may serve equally well for either of two or more tones whose pitches are theoretically different. This subject is necessarily of great practical importance in the construction of keyboard-instruments, like the pianoforte and the organ. Until comparatively recently such instruments were tuned in mean-tone or mesotonic temperament, so called because based on the use of a standard whole step or mean tone, which is an interval half-way between a greater and a less major second (see second[1], step, and tone[1]). This standard was applied to the tuning of twelve digitals to the octave—namely, C, C♯, D, E♭, E, F, F♯, G, G♯, A, B♭, and B; and provided for harmonious effects only in the keys (tonalities) of C, D, F, G, A, and B♭ major, and of D, G, and A minor. Other tonalities presented an intolerable deviation from pure temperament, which was called the 'wolf.' As the demand for greater freedom of modulation increased, various plans were tried for using more than twelve digitals to the octave, or for distributing the "wolf" more equally. The result of the latter effort is the system of equal or even temperament, first advocated by J. S. Bach early in the eighteenth century, though not universally adopted until the middle of the nineteenth century, in which the standard interval is the mean semitone—that is, the twelfth part of an octave. This distributes the "wolf" among all the tones of the instrument, so that the only intervals exactly true are octaves. Modulation, therefore, is made equally free in all directions; but, on the other hand, all chords are more or less out of tune. The benefits of the system in the way of providing a simple keyboard for music in many tonalities are largely counterbalanced by the constant deterioration of the sense of pure intonation on the part of those who use instruments tuned in this compromise temperament. This unmistakable disadvantage, reinforced by the fact that keyboard-instruments are much used in conjunction with the voice and with instruments of free intonation, like the violin, in which a just temperament is to be expected, has led to many new experiments with keyboards of more than twelve digitals to the octave, but without any result suitable for general adoption. Temperaments are sometimes known by various technical names, usually designating the interval chosen as a unit of measurement, such as commatic, schistic, etc.—Choleric or bilious temperament, a temperament which in its typical forms presents a swarthy complexion, dark hair and eyes, well developed musculature, strength of vital organs, and strong passions with tenacity of purpose.—Lymphatic temperament, a temperament which in its typical forms presents a pallid skin, flabby muscles, and sluggishness of vital, voluntary, and mental action.—Nervous temperament, a temperament which in its typical forms presents delicate features, frequent quick pulse, irritability of vital functions, and alertness of mind and body.—Sanguine temperament, a temperament which in its typical forms presents a brilliant complexion, activity of the circulation and respiration, ardent, not always persistent emotions, activity of mind and enterprise, somewhat lacking in tenacity.—To set the temperament. See set[1], v. t.

Temperance hotel, a hotel in which no intoxicating liquors are supplied to the guests or kept for sale.—Temperance movement, a social or political movement having for its object the restriction or abolition of the use of alcoholic liquors as beverages.—Temperance society, an association formed for the purpose of suppressing drunkenness. The basis on which these associations have been formed has been that of an engagement on the part of each member to abstain from the excessive or habitual use of intoxicating liquors. But, since the most strictly limited use of intoxicants as beverages is condemned by many social reformers, this name has been very generally applied to, or assumed by, associations which are more correctly designated total-abstinence societies.—Syn. 1. (a) Abstinence, Sobriety, etc. See abstemiousness.

temperancy† (tem'pėr-ạn-si), n. [As temperance (see -cy).] Temperance.

temperant†, a. [ME. temperant, temporaunt*, < OF. temperant, F. tempérant = Sp. It. temperante = Pg. temperante, < L. temperan(t-)s, ppr. of temperare, moderate, temper: see temper, temperate.] Moderate; temperate.

5. In music, same as tempered.—Temperate zones, the parts of the earth lying between the tropics and the polar circles, where the climate is cooler than between the tropics and warmer than within the polar circles. The north temperate zone is the space included between the tropic of Cancer and the arctic circle; and the south temperate zone, that between the tropic of Capricorn and the antarctic circle. See zone.—Syn. 1-4. Moderate, Temperate. See moderate.

temperate† (tem'pėr-āt), v. t. [< L. temperatus, pp. of temperare, modify, temper: see temper, v.] To temper; moderate.

> In heaven and earth this power beauty hath—
> It inflames temperance, and temp'rates wrath.
> Marston and Barksted, Insatiate Countess, i.
> Sometimes temperated by the comfortable winds, to which it lies open. Sandys, Travailes, p. 178.

temperately (tem'pėr-āt-li), adv. In a temperate manner or degree. (a) Moderately; not excessively.

I love good wine,
As I love health and joy of heart, but temperately.
Fletcher, Wit without Money, iii. 1.

(b) Without over-indulgence in eating, drinking, or the like; abstemiously; soberly.

God esteems it part of his service if we eat or drink; so it be temperately, and as may best preserve health.
Jer. Taylor.

(c) Without violence or extravagance; dispassionately; calmly; sedately.

Temperately proceed to what you would Thus violently redress. Shak., Cor., iii. 1. 219.

temperateness (tem′pėr-āt-nes), n. The state or character of being temperate. Specifically—(a) Moderation; freedom from excess: as, temperateness of language. (b) Due control of the natural appetites or desires; temperance; sobriety. (c) Calmness; sedateness; equanimity of mind. (d) Freedom from excessive heat or cold: as, the temperateness of a climate.

temperative (tem′pėr-ā-tiv), a. [< LL. temperativus, serving to moderate, < L. temperare, temper: see temper.] Having the power or quality of tempering.

temperature (tem′pėr-ā-tūr), n. [< OF. temperature (also temperure*, > ME. temperure), F. température = Pr. tempradura = Sp. templadura = Pg. temperatura, tempratura = It. temperatura, < L. temperatura, due measure, proportion, composition, or quality, temper, temperament, temperature, < temperare, moderate, temper: see temper. Cf. temperure.] 1†. Mixture, or that which is produced by mixture; a compound.

Made a temperature of brass and iron together.
Holland.

A proper temperature of fear and love. Abp. Secker.

2. Constitution; state; temperament.

The best composition and temperature is to have openness in fame and opinion, secrecy in habit.
Bacon, Simulation and Dissimulation (ed. 1887).

3†. Moderation; freedom from passions or excesses.

In that proud port which her so goodly graceth . . .
Most goodly temperature ye may descry.
Spenser, Sonnets, xiii.

A difficult thing it is for any man that is rich not to submit his minde and affection vnto his money; and, passing many a Crœsus in wealth, to beare a modest temperature with Numa. Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 590.

4†. Temper, as of metals.

The due temperature of stiff steel.
Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 95.

5†. Temperateness; mildness.

This teritory being 15. myle from the shoare, for pleasantnest of seate, for temporature of climate, fertility of soyle, and comoditie of the Sea, . . . is not to be excelled by any other whatsoeuer.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 87.

6. The state of a substance with regard to sensible heat; the degree or intensity of the sensible heat of a body. Primarily the conception of temperature is based on the different sensations produced by bodies when termed hot, warm, or cold, the hotter body being said to have the higher temperature. Again two bodies are said to have the same temperature when, by being placed in contact, neither is heated or cooled by the other. But these conceptions are relative. The absolute physical condition implied by temperature depends upon the nature of heat. Heat being considered to be molecular motion, temperature (or the degree of heat) is the expression of the velocity of the motion. The absolute scale of temperature recognizes this property, and preserves it in numerical measures which are proportional to the square of the corresponding molecular velocities. Thus temperature has the same dimensions as heat. The absolute zero of temperature is the point at which molecular motion ceases and all heat vanishes. This point is computed to be at −273° on the centigrade scale. Lord Kelvin has shown that the changes in either volume or pressure of an ideal gas would give an absolute scale of temperature which would give true relative measures of absolute amounts of heat. In this system the temperature t is defined by the equation $E = kt$, in which E is the average kinetic energy per molecule of a perfect gas which has that temperature, and k a constant. This is called the thermodynamic definition of temperature. It should be noted that temperatures of actual masses of matter, when expressed on this scale, are true relative measures of the absolute amounts of heat which they contain so far as the specific heat of the bodies remains constant. In practice temperature is measured by the changes produced in bodies by heat, and thermometry is the instrumental art employed. Experiments show that the air- or gas-thermometer approximates most closely to the thermodynamic requirement that its indications shall bear a linear relation to successive increments of heat. In the next instance, the normal mercurial thermometer possesses this property to a high degree, and the small departures of its indications from the linear law have been made the subject of elaborate investigation. Other thermometers differ more or less widely in their indications from the foregoing, and it is important to note that without the thermodynamic conception the definition of temperature is dependent on the particular instrument or method employed for its measurement. After considering the thermodynamic scale and its absolute zero, it will be recognized that the system of numeration of the usual Fahrenheit and centigrade scales is entirely arbitrary. Numerical temperatures on these scales have only a relative significance, and cannot be made to serve in any absolute sense. See thermometry.

Water boils at a lower temperature at the top of a mountain than it does at the seashore, and . . . ice melts at the same temperature in all parts of the world.
Clerk Maxwell, Heat, p. 33.

Our sensations of temperature vary considerably according to the "subjective" temperature.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 167.

7. Specifically, the thermal element of weather or climate. If the whole surface of the earth were either land or water, and perfectly homogeneous, there would be the same temperature at every point on the same latitude; but in the case of an entire land surface the difference of temperature between the equator and the pole, and consequently the temperature gradient, would be much greater than in the case of an earth entirely covered by water. In the case of the actual earth with continents and oceans, the temperature gradients between the equator and the pole on the continents are somewhat as they would be in the case of an entire land surface, while on the ocean they are somewhat as on an entire water surface, and consequently the temperature gradients on the former are greater than on the latter; hence there are differences of temperature on the same latitude in different longitudes, and temperature gradients arise between regions of land and regions of water. As a result of these diversifying conditions, the mean sea-level temperature can be expressed as a function of latitude and longitude only by empirical methods, and by utilizing a large mass of observed data. The diminution of temperature with altitude is a further variation that can often be independently treated.

8. In physiol. and pathol., the degree of heat of a living body, especially of the human body. It is usually taken, clinically, in the axilla, under the tongue, or in the rectum.

The pulse, respiration, and temperature may improve.
J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 398.

Absolute temperature. See absolute.—Absolute zero of temperature. See def. 6 and absolute.—Animal temperature, the temperature of an animal, which in cold-blooded animals is but slightly above that of their surroundings, but in warm-blooded animals is maintained at a more or less constant point considerably above that of their surroundings. In the latter it is under the control of a nervous (thermotaxic) mechanism, and is dependent on the coördinated regulation of the production of heat by vital metabolism (thermogenesis) and the loss of heat by conduction, by radiation, by evaporation, and otherwise (thermolysis). The temperature of a man in health, taken in the mouth or axilla, varies from about 98° to 99° F. Temperature above this is called pyrexia.—Critical temperature. Same as critical point (b). See under critical.—Mean temperature, a mean for any given period of air-temperatures systematically observed each day at a given place; or, without reference to time, the mean of a series of temperature observations extending over a long number of years. The latter is, more specifically, the mean annual temperature, and is the average of a series of annual means. The annual mean for any year is usually taken as the average of all the monthly means; the monthly mean is the average of the daily means; and the daily mean is obtained from some combination of individual observations.—Perverse temperature-sensations. See sensation.

temperature-alarm (tem′pėr-ā-tūr-a-lärm″), n. An adjustable apparatus for indicating automatically the variation from a certain point of the temperature of the place where it is fixed.

temperature-curve (tem′pėr-ā-tūr-kėrv), n. A curve exhibiting the change of temperature during a given period or over a given region.

tempered (tem′pėrd), a. 1. Having a certain temper or disposition; disposed: often used in composition: as, a good-tempered man.

When was my lord so much ungently temper'd,
To stop his ears against admonishment?
Shak., T. and C., v. 3. 1.

Loath was he to move
From the imprinted couch, and, when he did,
'Twas with slow, languid paces, and face hid
In muffling hands. So temper'd, out he stray'd.
Keats, Endymion, ii.

2. In music, noting an instrument, scale, or interval that is tuned in accordance with some other temperament than just or pure temperament, specifically one tuned in equal temperament. See temperament, 5.—Tempered clay, clay prepared for molding by moistening and kneading.—Tempered-clay machine, in brick-manuf., one of a class of machines by which tempered or moistened clay is molded into bricks or tiles.—Tempered glass. See glass.

temperedly (tem′pėrd-li), adv. In a tempered manner.

temperer (tem′pėr-ėr), n. [< temper + -er[1].] One who or that which tempers, in any sense.

They are weighed out in quantities of about 30 lbs., which contain from 250,000 to 500,000 needles, and are carried in boxes to the temperer. Ure, Dict., III. 410.

It is the duty of the temperer to see that sufficient water is let to the clay to soak it.
C. T. Davis, Bricks and Tiles, p. 113.

tempering (tem′pėr-ing), n. [Verbal n. of temper, v.] 1. The process of giving to any metal the desired hardness and elasticity. See temper, 9. Also called annealing.—2. In music, the act, process, or result of tuning an instrument, scale, or interval in accordance with some other temperament than just or pure temperament, especially with equal temperament. See temperament, 5.

tempering-furnace (tem′pėr-ing-fėr″nās), n. A furnace adapted for the uniform heating of articles which are to be tempered.

tempering-oven (tem′pėr-ing-uv″n), n. In glass-manuf., an annealing-oven used after the melting-oven.

tempering-wheel (tem′pėr-ing-hwēl), n. An apparatus for mixing and tempering clay for use in brick-making, etc. It consists of a heavy cast-iron wheel moving in a circular pit, and so geared that it alternately approaches the central pivot and recedes from it.

temperoure†, n. See temperure.

temper-screw (tem′pėr-skrö), n. 1. In well-boring, the connecting-link between the working-beam and the cable, which is let out as fast as the drill penetrates the rock, so as to regulate the play of the jars. When the whole length of the screw is run out, it is disengaged and carried up, so as in a few minutes to be ready for another run. See cut under oil-derrick.

2. A set-screw the point of which bears against an object or a bearing, and serves to adjust it.
E. H. Knight.

temperure†, n. [ME., also temperoure, temprure, < OF. temperure*, < L. temperatura, due measure, temper, temperature: see temperature.] Tempering; temperament.

The temprure of the mortere
Was maad of lycour wonder dere.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 4177.

An other suche as Arione, Whiche had an harpe of suche temprure
. . . that he the bestes wilde
Made of his note tame and milde.
Gower, Conf. Amant., Prol. (Richardson.)

tempest (tem′pest), n. [< ME. tempest, tempeste, < OF. tempeste, F. tempête = Pr. tempesta (< L. as if tempesta*; cf. tempestus, adj.) = Sp. tempestad = Pg. tempestade = It. tempestà, < L. tempesta(t-)s, time, esp. time with respect to physical conditions, weather, and specifically bad weather, a storm or tempest, hence also commotion, disturbance, < tempus (tempor-, tempos-), time: see temporal[1].] 1. A very violent storm; an extensive current of wind, rushing with great velocity and violence, and commonly attended with rain, hail, or snow; a furious gale; a hurricane.

Whan thei in ese wene best to lyve,
They ben with tempest alle fordryve.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 3782.

What at first was called a gust, the same Hath now a storm's, anon a tempest's name.
Donne, The Storm.

2. A violent tumult or commotion; perturbation; violent agitation: as, a tempest of the passions; a popular or political tempest.

The tempest in my mind
Doth from my senses take all feeling else
Save what beats there. Shak., Lear, iii. 4. 12.

A tempest in a tea-pot, a great disturbance over a small matter.=Syn. 1. Hurricane, etc. See wind[2].

tempest (tem′pest), v. [< ME. tempesten, < OF. tempester, F. tempêter = Pr. Sp. tempestar = Pg. tempestear = It. tempestare, storm; from the noun.] I. trans. To disturb violently, as by a tempest; rouse; throw into a state of commotion: agitate.

Tempest thee noght al croked to redresse,
In trust of hir that turneth as a ball.
Chaucer, Truth, l. 8.

Part huge of bulk,
Wallowing unwieldy, enormous in their gait,
Tempest the ocean. Milton, P. L., vii. 412.

Your last letters betray a mind . . . tempested up by a thousand various passions.
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xlvii.

II. intrans. To descend as a tempest; be tempestuous; storm. [Rare.]

And, by their excess
Of cold in virtue, and cross heat in vice,
Thunder and tempest on those learned heads,
Whom Cæsar with such honour doth advance.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

tempestarian (tem-pes-tā′ri-an), n. A sorcerer who professed to raise tempests by magical arts. Bingham, Antiquities, xvi. 5.

tempest-beaten (tem′pest-bē″tn), a. Beaten or disturbed by or as by a tempest.

In the calm harbour of whose gentle breast
My tempest-beaten soul may safely rest.
Dryden, Aurengzebe, i. 1.

tempestive† (tem′pes-tiv), a. [< OF. tempestif* = Sp. Pg. It. tempestivo, < L. tempestivus, timely, seasonable, opportune, < tempestas, time: see tempest.] Timely; seasonable.

This despised and dejected shrub . . . was left standing alone, neither obscured from the comfortable beams of the Sunne, nor couered from the chearefull and tempestiue showres of the Heauens.
Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 532.

tempestively† (tem′pes-tiv-li), adv. Seasonably.

Dancing is a pleasant recreation of body and mind, if tempestively used. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 499.

tempestivity† (tem-pes-tiv′i-ti), n. [= Sp. tempestividad = OIt. tempestività, < L. tempestivita(t-)s, timeliness, seasonableness, < tempestivus, timely, seasonable: see tempestive.] Seasonableness.

Since their dispersion, and habitation in countries whose constitutions admit not such tempestivity of harvests, . . . there will be found a great disparity in their observations. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 3.

tempest-tossed, tempest-tost (tem′pest-tost), a. Tossed by or as by a tempest.

Though his bark cannot be lost,
Yet it shall be tempest-tost.
Shak., Macbeth, i. 3. 25.

tempestuous (tem-pes′tū-us), a. [< OF. tempestueux, F. tempétueux = Pr. tempestuos, tempestos = Sp. Pg. tempestuoso = It. tempestoso, < LL. tempestuosus, stormy, turbulent, < L. tempestas, tempest: see tempest.] 1. Very stormy; turbulent; rough with wind; stormy: as, a tempestuous night. Also used figuratively.

We had now very tempestuous Weather, and excessive Rains, which so swell'd the River that it overflowed its Banks; so that we had much ado to keep our Ship safe. Dampier, Voyages, I. 360.

Her looks grow black as a tempestuous wind.
Dryden, Indian Emperor, iv. 4.

High in his hall, rock'd in a chair of state,
The king with his tempestuous council sate.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Epistles, xi. 76.

2. Subject to fits of stormy passion; impetuous.

Bruno was passionate, tempestuous, and weak. Ouida.

tempestuously (tem-pes′tū-us-li), adv. In a tempestuous manner; with great violence or commotion; turbulently.

tempestuousness (tem-pes′tū-us-nes), n. The state or character of being tempestuous; storminess; turbulence.

templar (tem′plär), n. [Formerly also templer; < ME. templere = D. tempelier = G. templer, < OF. (and F.) templier = Pr. templier = Sp. Pg. templario = It. tempiere, < ML. templarius, a templar, prop. adj., < L. templum, a temple: see temple[1].] 1. [cap.] A member of a military order, also called Knights Templars or Knights of the Temple, from the early headquarters of the order in the Crusaders' palace at Jerusalem (the so-called temple of Solomon). The order was founded at Jerusalem about 1118, and was confirmed by the Pope in 1128. Its special aim was protection to pilgrims on the way to the holy shrines, and the distinguishing garb of the knights was a white mantle with a red cross. The order took a leading part in the conduct of the Crusades, and spread rapidly, acquiring great wealth and influence in Spain, France, England, and other countries in Europe. Its chief seats in the East were Jerusalem, Acre, and Cyprus, and its European headquarters was a foundation called the Temple, then just outside of Paris. The members were composed of knights, men-at-arms, and chaplains; they were grouped in commanderies, with a preceptor at the head of each province, and a grand master at the head of the order. The Templars were accused of heresy, immorality, and other offenses by Philip IV. of France in 1307, and the order was suppressed by the Council of Vienne in 1312.

In that Temple duellen the Knyghtes of the Temple, that weren wont to be clept Templeres; and that was the foundacioun of here Ordre. Mandeville, Travels, p. 88.

2. A student of the law, or a lawyer, so called from having chambers in the Temple in London. See temple[1], 5.

The reader cannot but observe what pains I have been at in polishing the style of my book to the greatest exactness: nor have I been less diligent in refining the orthography by spelling the words in the very same manner as they are pronounced by the chief patterns of politeness at court, at levees, at assemblies, at play-houses, at the prime visiting places, by young templers, and by gentlemen-commoners of both universities, who have lived at least a twelvemonth in town, and kept the best company. Swift, Polite Conversation, Int.

The Whigs answered that it was idle to apply ordinary rules to a country in a state of revolution; that the great question now depending was not to be decided by the saws of pedantic Templars. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., x.

Good Templar, a member of the Society of Good Templars, organized for the promotion of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks, and modeled in some respects upon the system of freemasonry.—Knights Templars. (a) See def. 1. (b) See knight.

templar (tem′plär), a. [< LL. templaris, of or pertaining to a temple, < L. templum, temple: see temple[1].] Of, pertaining to, or performed in a temple. [Rare.]

template (tem′plāt), n. Same as templet.

temple[1] (tem′pl), n. [< ME. temple, < AS. templ, ★tempel = D. G. Sw. Dan. tempel = OF. (and F.) temple = Sp. Pg. templo = It. tempio, < L. templum, an open space, the circuit of the heavens, a consecrated place, a temple, prob. for temulum*, akin to Gr. τέμενος, a piece of ground cut or marked off, a sacred inclosure, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut (see temenos).] 1. An edifice dedicated to the service of a deity or deities, and connected with a system of worship. The most celebrated and architecturally perfect of the ancient temples were those of the Greeks, as that of Zeus at Olympia, that of Athena Parthenos (the Parthenon) at Athens, and that of Apollo at Delphi. The form ordinarily given to classical temples was that of a rectangle, but sometimes the construction was circular, or even of irregular plan. Vitruvius divides temples into eight kinds, according to the arrangement of their columns: namely, temples in antis (see antæ), prostyle, amphiprostyle, peripteral, dipteral, pseudodipteral, hypethral, and monopteral. (See these words.) In regard to intercolumniation, they are further distinguished as pycnostyle, systyle, eustyle, diastyle, and areostyle structures, and in regard to the number of columns in front, as tetrastyle, hexastyle, octastyle, and decastyle. (See these words.) Circular temples are known as monopteral, with or without a cella. The temples of ancient Egypt are impressive from their great size and from the number and mass of the pillars ordinarily introduced in their construction; those of India are remarkable for the elaborateness of their plan and elevation, and the lavishness of their sculptured decoration. See also cuts under dipteral, cella, monopteron, octastyle, pantheon, opisthodomos, and prostyle.

A, stereobate. B, stylobate. C, C, columns of peristyle. D, interior columns of cella. E, capital of column: h, abacus; i, echinus; j, hypotrachelium. F, entablature: a, architrave; b, frieze; c, cornice; d, triglyph; e, metope; f, f, mutules; g, regula with guttæ. G, acroterium. H, H, portions of the pediment. I, I, walls of cella. K, K, hypothetical apertures in the roof for the admission of light to the cella.

In this connection the term "house of God" has quite a different sense from that which we connect with it when we apply it to a Christian place of worship. A temple is not a meeting-place for worshippers; for many ancient temples were open only to priests, and as a general rule the altar, which was the true place of worship, stood not within the house but before the door. The temple is the dwelling-house of the deity to which it is consecrated, whose presence is marked by a statue or other sacred symbol; and in it his sacred treasures, the gifts and tribute of his worshippers, are kept, under the charge of his attendants or priests. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 165.

2. The religious edifice of the Jews in Jerusalem. There were three buildings successively erected in the same spot, and entitled, from the names of their builders, the temple of Solomon, the temple of Zerubbabel, and the temple of Herod. The first was built by Solomon, and was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar about 586 B. C. The second was built by the Jews on their return from the captivity (about 537 B. C.), and was pillaged or partially destroyed several times, as by Antiochus Epiphanes, Pompey, and Herod. The third, the largest and most magnificent of the three, was begun by Herod the Great, and was completely destroyed at the capture of Jerusalem by the Romans (A. D. 70). Various attempts have been made toward the restoration of the first and the third of these temples, but scholars are not agreed in respect to architectural details. The ornament and design were in any case of severe and simple character, though rich materials were used. The successive temples all consisted of a combination of buildings, comprising courts separated from and arising one above another, and provided also with chambers for the use of the priests and for educational purposes. The inclosure of Herod's temple covered nineteen acres. It comprised an outer court of the Gentiles, a court of the women, a court of Israel, a court of the priests, and the temple building, with the holy place, and within all—entered only once a year, and only by the high priest—the holy of holies. Within the court of the priests were the great altar and the laver, within the holy place the golden candlestick, the altar of incense, and the table for the showbread, and within the holy of holies the ark of the covenant and the mercy-seat.

And he sware, By this Habitacle—that is, the Themple. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 138.

3. An edifice erected as a place of public worship; a church; in France, specifically, a Protestant church, as distinguished from a Roman Catholic place of worship, which alone is usually spoken of as a church (église).

That time [for the outward service] to me towards you is Tuesday, and my temple the Rose in Smithfield. Donne, Letters, xxiv.

The true Christian . . . loves the good, under whatever temple, at whatever altar he may find them. Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, iii.

4. Metaphorically, any place in which the divine presence specially resides.

Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? 1 Cor. vi. 19.

My chamber were no temple, my body were no temple, except God came to it. Donne, Sermons, iv.

5. [cap.] The name of two semi-monastic establishments of the middle ages, one in London, the other in Paris, occupied by the Knights Templars. The Temple Church, London, is the only part of either establishment now existing. On the site of the London Temple the two Inns of Court called the Middle Temple and Inner Temple now stand; they have long been occupied by barristers, and are the joint property of the two societies called the Societies of the Inner and of the Middle Temple, which have the right of calling candidates to the degree of barrister. The Temple in Paris was the prison of Louis XVI. and the royal family during their sufferings in 1792 and 1793.

6†. An inn of court.

A gentle maunciple was ther of a temple.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 567.

Master of the temple. See master[1].—Temple jar, temple vase, a jar or vase such as is used for the decoration and ceremonial of religious temples in China, Japan, etc.—Temple jewelry. See jewelry.

temple[1] (tem′pl), v. t.; pret. and pp. templed, ppr. templing. [< temple[1], n.] To build a temple for; appropriate a temple to; inclose in a temple. [Rare.]

The heathen (in many places) templed and adored this drunken god. Feltham, Resolves, i. 84.

temple[2] (tem′pl), n. [< ME. temple, < OF. temple, F. tempe, dial. temple = Pr. templa = It. tempia, < L. tempora, the temples, pl. of tempus, temple, head, face.] 1. The region of the head or skull behind the eye and forehead, above and mostly in front of the ear. This area corresponds to the temporal fossa above the zygomatic arch, where the skull is very thin and is covered by the temporal muscle.

King Helenus wav'd high the Thracian blade,
And smote his temples with an arm so strong
The helm fell off, and roll'd amid the throng.
Pope, Iliad, xiii. 729.

2. In entom., the posterior part of the gena, or that immediately beneath the eye.—3. One of the bars sometimes added to the ends of spectacle-bows to give them a firmer hold on the head of the wearer. See spectacle, 5.—4. An ornament worn at the side of the head or covering the side of the head, mentioned in the fifteenth century as apparently sometimes of needlework, sometimes set with jewels. Fairholt.

temple[3] (tem′pl), n. [< F. temple, templet.] An attachment to a loom for keeping the cloth stretched, while the reed beats the threads into place after each throw of the shuttle. One form is automatic, releasing the cloth and then stretching it after each stroke of the lay.

templeless (tem′pl-les), a. [< temple[1] + -less.] Devoid of a temple. Bulwer, Caxtons, iv. 2.

templer† (tem′plèr), n. See templar.

templet (tem′plet), n. [< F. templet, a stretcher, < L. templum, a small timber, a purlin.] 1. A pattern, guide, or model used to indicate the shape any piece of work is to assume when finished. It may also be used as a tool in modeling plastic material, or as a guide placed in a milling-machine, shaper-lathe, or other automatic cutting-machine. In these applications it may be a thin piece of wood or metal, with one or all the edges cut in profile to the shape of the baluster, cornice, part of a machine, or other object to be wrought to shape. Templets are also used as guides in filing sheet-metal to shape, as in making small brass gears for clocks, sheets of brass being clamped between steel templets, and all the parts projecting beyond the edges being filed away. Templets are used in founding as patterns in forming molds in loam.

Templet for a Baluster.

2. A strip of metal used in boiler-making, pierced with a series of holes, and serving as a guide in marking out a line of rivet-holes.—3. In building: (a) A short piece of timber or a large stone placed in a wall to receive the impost of a girder, beam, etc., and distribute its weight. (b) A beam or plate spanning a door- or window-space to sustain joists and throw their weight on the piers. (c) One of the wedges in a building-block. E. H. Knight.—4. Same as temple[3].—5. In a brilliant, same as bezel, 2. See cut under brilliant.

Also template.

templify (tem′pli-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. templified, ppr. templifying. To make into a temple. [Rare.]

That shall we come to, if we can take order that while we be here, before we go hence, our bodies, we get them templified, as I may say, procure they be framed after the similitude of a Temple, this Temple in the text [John ii. 19]. Bp. Andrews, Sermons, II. 361. (Davies.) tempo[1] (tem'pō), n. [It., < L. tempus, time: see tense[2], temporal[1].] 1. In music, the relative rapidity of rhythm; time; movement. It is indicated either by such terms as grave, lento, adagio, moderato, allegro, presto, etc. (see these words), with various modifying adverbs, like molto, non troppo, più, etc., or by reference to a machine called the metronome (which see). A modification of the original tempo of a given piece is indicated by terms like accelerando, stringendo, rallentando, ritenuto, etc. After such modification, a return to the original tempo is marked by a tempo or a tempo primo. An irregular or capricious tempo is marked by ad libitum, a piacere, or tempo rubato. A change from one kind of rhythm to another without change of speed is marked by l'istesso tempo. 2. The characteristic rhythmical and metrical movement or pattern of a dance: as, tempo di valse, tempo di menuetto, etc.—Senza tempo. See senza.—Tempo primo. See primo.

tempo[2] (tem'pō), n. [Jap., < Chinese tien pao, 'heavenly recompense.'] An oval brass coin, with a square hole in the middle, first coined in Japan during the period "tempo" (1830–43 inclusive), and now equal to eight rin or cash, or eight tenths of a sen. One hundred and twenty-five tempos make one yen.

temporal[1] (tem'pō-ral), a. and n. [< ME. temporal, < OF. temporal, temporel, F. temporel = Pr. Sp. Pg. temporal = It. temporale, < L. temporalis, < tempus (tempor-), season, time, opportunity: see tense[2].] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to time; expressing relations of time: as, a temporal clause; a temporal adverb.

Temporal Use.—By far the most frequent use of the A. S. absolute participle is to indicate relations of time, a fact that is not surprising, since in Latin all the uses of the ablative absolute sprang from the temporal use of the ablative. Amer. Jour. Philol., X. 334.

2. Of or pertaining to time in the sense of the present life or this world; secular: distinguished from spiritual.

With true prayers . . .
From fasting maids, whose minds are dedicate
To nothing temporal. Shak., M. for M., ii. 2. 155.

Torlton, was this thy spiritual pretence?
But O! thy actions were too temporal.
Drayton, Barons' Wars, iii. 34.

She took more effectual means than any of her predecessors to circumscribe the temporal powers of the clergy.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 26.

3. Measured or limited by time, or by this life or this state of things; having limited existence; of short duration; enduring for a time: opposed to eternal.

Forsothe he that hath nat roote in hym self, but it is temporal; that is, it lastith bot a litil tyme.
Wyclif, Mat. xiii. 21.

The things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal. 2 Cor. iv. 18.

4. In gram., relating to a tense, or to the distinction of time expressed by tenses.

The tenseless phrase in order to, used alike for present and past purposes in English, fails to convey the temporal ideas conveyed by the Latin present and imperfect subjunctive. Amer. Jour. Philol., VII. 459.

Lords temporal. See lord.—Temporal augment. See augment, 2.—Temporal eccentricity, peer, proposition, etc. See the nouns.—Temporal power, the rule or dominion of an ecclesiastic in material as distinguished from spiritual matters: used chiefly with reference to the rule of the Pope, who was an important temporal or territorial ruler in Rome and over a considerable part of Italy from the early middle ages down to 1870.=Syn. 2. Secular, Earthly, etc. (see worldly), terrestrial, mundane.—2 and 3. Temporary, Temporal. Temporary, lasting but a short time: as, a temporary staging; temporal, belonging to time, hence belonging to this world, secular, or limited by time, not permanent, although perhaps not so fleeting as temporary things.

II. n. Anything temporal or secular; a temporality; a temporal matter or affair.

If we wait the coming of the angel, and in the mean time do our duty with care, and sustain our temporals with indifferency. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 79.

The procurator has the care of the temporals of the convent, and is always a Spaniard.
★ Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 11.

temporal[2] (tem'pō-ral), a. and n. [= F. temporal, < NL. temporalis, < L. tempora, the temples: see temple[2].] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the temple or temples of the head: said chiefly of mammals and especially of man.—2. In entom., postorbital; situated just behind or beneath the compound eyes.—Anterior temporal artery, one of the two terminal branches of the superficial temporal artery, ramifying over the fore part of the head, and distributed to the orbicular and frontal muscles, the pericranium, and the skin.—Deep temporal arteries, two branches, the anterior and the posterior, of the internal maxillary, supplying the temporal muscle.—Deep temporal nerves, two branches, anterior and posterior, of the inferior maxillary nerve, distributed to the anterior and posterior portions of the temporal fossa.—Middle temporal artery, a branch of the superficial temporal, arising close above the zygoma, and distributed to the temporal muscle.—Middle temporal vein, a large vein which receives the blood from the substance of the temporal muscle, and unites above the zygoma with the temporal vein.—Posterior temporal artery, the larger of the two terminal branches of the superficial temporal, ramifying on the side of the head, and distributed to the coverings of the skull.—Superficial temporal artery, the temporal artery proper, one of the two terminal branches of the external carotid, beginning a little below the condyle of the jaw, passing through the substance of the parotid gland, and dividing above the zygoma into the anterior and posterior temporal. It gives branches to the parotid gland, the masseter muscle, and the articulation of the jaw.—Temporal aponeurosis, the temporal fascia.—Temporal arch. Same as zygomatic arch (which see, under zygomatic).—Temporal artery, an arterial branch supplying the temporal region or muscle, especially the superficial temporal artery.—Temporal bone, in human anat., a complex and composite bone, representing several distinct and independent bones of many vertebrates, situated at the

omy, while the tympanic or tympanal bone, forming the so-called vaginal and auditory processes, is properly a separate element (see tympanic, tympanohyal). The so-called styloid process is also a distinct element, belonging to the hyoidean arch, its ankylosis with the temporal of man being anomalous. The general character of the temporal bone is maintained throughout mammals, but is greatly modified in other vertebrates.—Temporal canal, a small canal leading from the orbital to the temporal surface of the malar bone, for the passage of one of the divisions of the temporomalar nerve.—Temporal convolutions, the three convolutions of the temporal lobe on the convex surface of the hemisphere, numbered first, second, and third from above downward; the temporal gyri.—Temporal fascia, fossa, ganglion. See the nouns.—Temporal fissures. Same as temporal sulci.—Temporal gyri. See gyrus.—Temporal lines. See line[2], and cut under parietal.—Temporal lobe. Same as temporosphenoidal lobe (which see, under lobe).—Temporal muscle, that muscle of mastication of man and many other vertebrates which arises from the surface of the temporal fossa, above and in front of the ear, and is inserted into the coronoid process of the lower jaw. But its relative size, its shape, and to some extent its site vary much in different animals.—Temporal plane. See plane[1].—Temporal point, a tender point on the back part of the temple or the auriculotemporal nerve, or a little lower down just above the zygoma. It is developed in neuralgia of the inferior division of the fifth nerve.—Temporal region, the temple and adjacent parts: practically the same as the temporal fossa and its contents.—Temporal ridges. Same as temporal lines.—Temporal sulci. See sulcus.—Temporal suture. Same as petrosquamous suture (which see, under petrosquamous).—Temporal vein, the vein associated with the superficial temporal artery, forming by union with the temporomaxillary vein the beginning of the principal external jugular vein.

II. n. The bone of the temple, or os temporis. See temporal bone, above.

temporale (tem-pō-rā'lē), n. [ML., neut. of L. temporalis, of the time: see temporal[1].] That part of the breviary and missal which contains the proper portions of the daily offices, in the order of the ecclesiastical year, beginning with Advent.

Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 42.

Let no man say, when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil neither tempteth he any man; but every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust and enticed. Jas. i. 13, 14.

4. To provoke; defy; act presumptuously toward.

Ye shall not tempt the Lord your God. Deut. vi. 16.

Tempt him not so too far; I wish, forbear:
In time we hate that which we often fear.
Shak., A. and C., i. 3. 11.

It behoov'd him to have bin more cautious how he tempted Gods finding out of blood and deceit. Milton, Eikonoklastes, ix.

5†. To attempt; endeavor to do, accomplish, or reach; venture on.

Who shall tempt, with wandering feet,
The dark unbottom'd infinite abyss?
Milton, P. L., ii. 404.

What though defeated once thou'st been, and known,
Tempt it again. B. Jonson, Catiline, ii. 1.

=Syn. 2 and 3. To lure, inveigle, decoy, bait, bribe.

tempt† (tempt), n. [< tempt, v.] An attempt.

By the issues of all tempts they found no certain conclusion but this, "God and heaven are strong against us in all we do." Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 76.

temptability (temp-ta-bil′i-ti), n. [< temptable + -ity (see -bility).] The character of being temptable.

temptable (temp′ta-bl), a. [< tempt + -able.] That may be tempted; accessible to temptation.

If the parliament were as temptable as any other assembly, the managers must fail for want of tools to work with. Swift.

temptableness (temp′ta-bl-nes), n. The character of being temptable; temptability.

temptation (temp-tā′shọn), n. [< ME. temptacioun, < OF. temptacion, tentation, F. tentation = Pr. temptacio, tentacio = Sp. tentación = Pg. tentação = It. tentazione, < L. tentatio(n-), trial, temptation, < tentare, try, test, tempt: see tempt.] 1. The act of testing or trying; trial. [Archaic.]

Or hath God assayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation, by temptations, by signs, and by wonders? Deut. iv. 34.

A temptation is only another word for an experiment, or trial; a trial whether we will do or forbear such a thing. Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. iv.

2. Enticement to evil, as by specious argument, flattery, or the offer of some real or apparent good.

Most dangerous
Is that temptation that doth goad us on
To sin in loving virtue. Shak., M. for M., ii. 2. 182.

He who resigns the world has no temptation to envy, hatred, malice, anger. Steele, Spectator, No. 282.

He drilled himself till inflexible habit stood sentinel before all those postern-weaknesses which temperament leaves unbolted to temptation. Lowell, Cambridge Thirty Years Ago.

3. The state of being tempted, or enticed to evil.

And lead [bring, R. V.] us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil [the evil one, R. V.]. Mat. vi. 13.

In the sixth petition [of the Lord's Prayer], which is, "And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," we pray that God would either keep us from being tempted to sin, or support and deliver us when we are tempted. Shorter Catechism, ans. to qu. 106.

By one man's firm obedience fully tried Through all temptation. Milton, P. R., i. 5.

4. That which tempts, or entices to evil; an enticement; an allurement; any tempting or alluring object.

Set a deep glass of rhenish wine on the contrary casket, for if the devil be within and that temptation without, I know he will choose it. Shak., M. of V., i. 2. 106.

There is no place, no state, or scene of life, that hath not its proper and peculiar temptations.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. x.

Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 665.

tempter (temp'tėr), n. [< ME. temptour, < OF. tempteor, tempteur*, tenteur, F. tentateur = Pr. Sp. Pg. tentador = It. tentatore, < L. tentator, one who tempts or attempts, < tentare, tempt: see tempt.] One who tempts; one who solicits or entices to evil.

Is this her fault or mine?
The tempter or the tempted?
Shak., M. for M., ii. 2. 163.

The tempter, the great adversary of man; the devil.

And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread.
Mat. iv. 3.

So glozed the tempter, and his proem tuned;
Into the heart of Eve his words made way.
Milton, P. L., ix. 549.

tempting (temp'ting), p. a. [Ppr. of tempt, v.] That tempts, entices, or allures; attractive; seductive: as, tempting pleasures.

So peruerse stomakes haue they borne to women that the more part of their temptynge spretes they haue made she deuyls. Bp. Bale, English Votaries, Pref.

To whom [his precursors] he thus owed the service, often an important one in such cases, of exhausting the most tempting forms of errour.
Whewell, Novum Organon Renovatum.

temptingly (temp'ting-li), adv. In a tempting manner; seductively; attractively; alluringly.

As much as know her name; there's temption in't.
Middleton and Rowley, Spanish Gypsy, i. 5.

temptress (temp'tres), n. [Formerly also temptcress; < ME. temptresse, < OF. temptresse (cf. F. tentatrice = It. tentatrice); as tempter + -ess.] A woman who tempts or entices.

She was my temptress, the foul provoker. Scott.

tempus (tem'pus), n. [L., time: see tense[1], temporal[1].] In medieval music, a method of dividing a breve into semibreves — that is, rhythmical subdivision. In tempus perfectum a breve is equal to three semibreves, in tempus imperfectum to two. Compare mode[1], 7 (b), and prolation, 4.

temse (tems), n. [Formerly also tems, temps, tempse; < ME. temse, tempse, < AS. temes* = MD. tems, tems[†], D. tems = MLG. temes, temis, temese, a colander, sieve; cf. F. tamis = Pr. tamis = Sp. tamiz = It. tamigio (Venetian tamiso) (ML. tamisium), a sieve; origin obscure.] A sieve; a searce; a bolter; a strainer. See the quotation from "Notes and Queries." According to a common statement, the proverbial saying "He'll never set the Thames on fire" (that is, he'll never make any figure in the world) contains this word in a corrupt form. "The temse was a corn-sieve which was worked in former times over the receiver of the sifted flour. A hard-working, active man would not unfrequently ply the temse so quickly as to set fire to the wooden hoop at the bottom." (Brewer.) No evidence for this statement appears. The word Thames was in Middle English Temse, etc., Anglo-Saxon Temese. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

Marcolphus toke a lytyll cyve or temse in his oon hande, and a foot of a bere in the othre hande.
Salomon and Marcolphus. (Halliwell.)

I have seen it stated during this discussion and elsewhere that a tems in North and West Lancashire means a grain riddle; but this is not exact. A tems proper is a sieve with deep sides, very like a peck measure, is 10 or 12 inches in diameter, and has a bottom of woven horsehair. It is used for taking small particles of butter out of the buttermilk just after churning; one person holds the tems over a vessel and another pours in the buttermilk, the hair-work passing the milk and catching the particles of butter. This would not cause a fire, neither is a grain-riddle firing by ordinary hand usage more probable. When worked at the quickest one man riddles while another fills, and the riddle is emptied several times in a minute. The grain also is cold in its normal state, and there is no chance of it or the riddle's getting heated by friction. To a practical man a riddle firing would sound most absurd. If you say to a Lancashire labourer, "Tha'll ne'er set th' tems afire," a hundred to one he would understand the river Thames. N. and Q., 6th ser., IX. 14.

temse (tems), v. t.; pret. and pp. temsed, ppr. temsing. [Formerly also tempse; < ME. temsen, tempsen, < AS. temsian (= D. temsen = MLG. temesen), sift; from the noun.] To sift. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

temse-bread (tems'bred), n. Bread made of flour better sifted than common flour. [Prov. Eng.]

temse-loaf (tems'lōf), n. Same as temse-bread. [Prov. Eng.]

Some mixeth to miller the rhye with the wheat,
Tems-loaf on his table to have for to eat.
Tusser, September's Husbandry.

temulence (tem'ū-lens), n. [< F. témulence = Pg. temulencia = It. temulenza, < L. temulentia, drunkenness, intoxication, < temulentus, drunk: see temulent.] Intoxication; inebriation; drunkenness. [Rare.]

temulency (tem'ū-len-si), n. [As temulence (see -cy).] Same as temulence. Bailey. [Rare.]

temulent (tem'ū-lent), a. [= Sp. Pg. temulento, < L. temulentus, drunk.] Intoxicated; given to drink. [Rare.]

He was recognized, in then temulent Germany, as the very prince of topers. Sir W. Hamilton.

temulentive† (tem'ū-len-tiv), a. [< temulent + -ive.] Drunken; in a state of inebriation. F. Junius, Sin Stigmatized (1639), p. 38. [Rare.]

temulently (tem'ū-lent-li), adv. In a drunken manner. Bailey, 1727.

temulentness (tem'ū-lent-nes), n. Same as temulence. Bailey.

ten (ten), a. and n. [< ME. ten, tene, < AS. tēn, tién, tēne = OS. tehan = OFries. tian, tien = D. tien = MLG. tein, LG. tien = OHG. zehan, MHG. zehen, zen, G. zehn = Icel. tíu = Dan. ti = Sw. tio = Ir. But, whiles he thought to steal the single ten,
The king was slyly finger'd from the deck!
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 1. 43.

4. Ten o'clock in the morning or evening: as, I was to be there at ten.—5. A certain weight of coal used in the coal-fields of Durham and Northumberland, England, for reckoning the royalty to be paid by the lessee to the lessor. It varies between 48 and 50 tons. Gresley.—Catch the ten. See catch[1].—Upper ten. See upper.

ten†, adv. Ten times.

Forbede a love, and it is ten so wood.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 736.

tenability (ten-a-bil'i-ti), n. [< tenable + -ity (see -bility).] The state or character of being tenable; tenableness.

tenable (ten'a-bl), a. [< F. tenable, < tenir = Pr. tener, tenir = Sp. tener = Pg. ter = It. tenere, hold, keep, < L. tenere, hold, keep: see tenant[1].] 1. Capable of being held, maintained, or defended successfully against an assailant; successfully defensible against attacks or arguments or objections: as, a tenable fortress; a tenable theory.

Infidelity has been attacked with so good success of late years that it is driven out of all its out-works. The atheist has not found his post tenable, and is therefore retired into deism. Addison, Spectator, No. 186.

The place was scarcely tenable, and it was abandoned on the approach of the Spanish army.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 3.

2†. Held; retained; kept secret or inviolate.

If you have hitherto conceal'd this sight,
Let it be tenable in your silence still.
Shak., Hamlet, i. 2. 248.

tenableness (ten'a-bl-nes), n. The state of being tenable; tenability.

tenace (ten'ās), n. [< F. tenace, tenacious, in demeurer tenace, hold the best and third best cards, lit. 'stay tenacious': see demur and tenacious.] In whist, the best and third best cards, or the second and fourth best cards, in play, of a suit: known in the former case as a major tenace, in the latter as a minor tenace.

tenacious (tē-nā'shus), a. [= F. tenace = Sp. Pg. tenaz = It. tenace, < L. tenax (tenac-), holding fast, < tenere, hold: see tenant[1].] 1. Holding fast, or inclined to hold fast; inclined to retain what is in possession: with of before the thing held; hence, stubborn; obstinate.

A resolute tenacious adherence to well chosen principles. South.

A man is naturally most tenacious of that which is most liable to be taken from him.
E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 397.

The religion of ancient Egypt was very tenacious, and not easily effaced.
J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, vii. 6.

2. Retentive; apt to retain long what is committed to it: said of the memory.

The memory of some . . . is very tenacious.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. x. § 5.

3†. Niggardly; close-fisted. Bailey, 1727.—4. Apt to adhere to another substance; adhesive, as ropy, glutinous, or viscous matter; sticky; viscid: as, few substances are so tenacious as tar.—5. Tough; having great cohesive force between its particles, so that they resist any effort to pull or force them asunder: as, steel is the most tenacious of all known substances.

tenaciously (tē-nā'shus-li), adv. In a tenacious manner. (a) With a disposition to hold fast what is possessed; firmly; determinedly; with unyielding obstinacy; obstinately. (b) Adhesively; with cohesive force.

tenaciousness (tē-nā'shus-nes), n. The state or character of being tenacious, in any sense; tenacity.

I can allow in clergymen, through all their divisions, some tenaciousness of their own opinion.
Burke, Rev. in France.

tenacity (tē-nas'i-ti), n. [< F. ténacité = Sp. tenacidad = Pg. tenacidade = It. tenacità, < L. tenacita(t-)s, a holding fast, < tenax (tenac-), holding fast: see tenacious.] 1. The property or character of being tenacious, in any sense. Specifically—(a) Firmness of hold or of purpose; obstinacy.

I find to my grief that the misunderstanding tenacity of some zealous spirits hath made it a quarrel.
Bp. Hall, The Reconciler.

Old associations cling to the mind with astonishing tenacity. Hawthorne, Old Manse, p. 114.

Their moral notions, though held with strong tenacity, seem to have no standard beyond hereditary custom.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, iv. 1.

The tenacity of the English bull-dog . . . was a subject of national boasting. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., iv.

(b) Retentiveness, as of memory. (c) Adhesiveness; that property of matter by virtue of which things stick or adhere to others; glutinousness; stickiness. (d) That property of material bodies by which their parts resist an effort to force or pull them asunder; also, the measure of the resistance of bodies to tearing or crushing: in this sense opposed to fragility. Tenacity results from the attraction of cohesion which exists between the particles of bodies, and the stronger this attraction is in any body the greater is the tenacity of the body. Tenacity is consequently different in different materials, and in the same material it varies with the state of the body in regard to temperature and other circumstances. The resistance offered to tearing is called absolute tenacity, that offered to crushing retroactive tenacity. The tenacity of wood is much greater in the direction of the length of its fibers than in the transverse direction. With regard to metals, the processes of forging and wire-drawing increase their tenacity in the longitudinal direction; and mixed metals have, in general, greater tenacity than those which are simple. See cohesion.

The tenacity of a substance may be defined as the greatest longitudinal stress that it can bear without tearing asunder.
J. D. Everett, Units and Physical Constants, p. 56.

tenaculum (tē-nak'ū-lum), n.; pl. tenacula (-lä). [NL., < LL. tenaculum, an instrument for holding, < L. tenere, hold: see tenant[1].] 1. A sharp hook, set in a handle, used for picking up arteries in surgical operations, and in dissections.

These [arterial branches] are difficult to tie, even when picked up by the tenaculum.
J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 62.

2. In entom., the pair of microscopic chitinous processes on the under side of the abdomen of podurans or springtails, serving as a catch to hold the elater or springing-organ in place. A. S. Packard.

tenacy† (ten′ā-si), n. [< L. tenax (tenac-) (see tenacious) + -y[3].] Tenacity; obstinacy.

Highest excellence is void of all envy, selfishness, and tenacy. Barrow, Sermons, II. xii. (Latham.) tenail, tenaille (te-nāl′), n. [< F. tenaille = Pr. tenalha = Sp. tenaza = It. tanaglia, < ML. tenacula*, f., orig. LL. neut. pl. of tenaculum, a holder: see tenaculum.] In fort., an outwork or rampart raised in the main ditch immediately in front of the curtain, between two bastions. In its simplest form it consists of two faces forming with each other a reëntering angle; but generally it consists of three faces forming two reëntering angles, in which case it is called a double tenail. Any work belonging either to permanent or to field fortification which, on the plan, consists of a succession of lines forming salient and reëntering angles alternately, is said to be à tenaille.

tenaillon (te-na-yoṅ′), n. [F.: see tenail.] In fort., a work constructed on each side of the ravelins, like the lunettes, but differing in that one of the faces of the tenaillon is in the direction of the ravelin, whereas that of the lunette is perpendicular to it. Works of this kind are seldom adopted.

tenancy (ten′an-si), n. [< OF. tenance, possession, = Sp. Pg. tenencia = ML. tenentia, < L. tenen(t-)s, a tenant: see tenant[1].] 1. In law: (a) A holding by private ownership; estate; tenure: as, tenancy in fee simple; tenancy in tail. (b†) A habitation or dwelling-place held of another.

The said John Scrips had in like sort divided a Tenement in Shordich into or about seventeene Tenancies or dwellings, and the same inhabited by divers persons.
Proc. in Star Chamber, an. 40 Queen Elizabeth, quoted in [Ribton-Turner's Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 123.

2. The period during which lands or tenements are held or occupied by a tenant.—Entire tenancy. See entire.—Estate in joint tenancy. See estate.—Several tenancy. See entire tenancy.—Severance of a joint tenancy. See severance.—Tenancy at will. See estate at will, under estate.—Tenancy by entireties. See entirety.—Tenancy by the courtesy of England. See courtesy of England, under courtesy.—Tenancy from year to year, a tenancy which is implied by law sometimes, on the termination of a lease for a year or years and a continuance of the possession without a new agreement.—Tenancy in common, a holding in common with others; an estate consisting in a right to a share of an undivided thing; a tenancy in which all have or are entitled to a common or joint possession, but each has a separate or several title to his undivided share which he can dispose of without affecting the others: distinguished from joint tenancy. See estate. Sometimes called coparcenary.

tenant[1] (ten′ant), n. [< ME. tenant, tenaunt, < OF. tenant, a tenant, = Pg. It. tenente, a lieutenant, < L. tenen(t-)s, ppr. of tenere, hold, keep, possess. Cf. lieutenant. From the L. tenere are also ult. E. tenable, tenacious, tenacy, tempt, temptation, etc.] 1. In law: (a) A person who holds real property by private ownership, by any kind of title, either in fee, for life, for years, or at will. The term is sometimes used in reference to interests in pure personalty, as when we speak of one as tenant for life of a fund. (b) More specifically, one who holds under a superior owner, as a lessee or occupant for rent: used thus as correlative to landlord.

I have been your tenant, and your father's tenant, these fourscore years. Shak., Lear, iv. 1. 14.

[The word always implies indirectly the existence of a paramount right, like that of a feudal lord or the modern right of eminent domain. States or nations are not spoken of as tenants of their own property; subjects and citizens are.]

(c) A defendant in a real action. See action, 8 (b).—2. One who has possession of any place; a dweller; an occupant.

Oh fields! Oh woods! when, when shall I be made
The happy tenant of your shade?
Cowley, The Wish.

The sheepfold here
Pours out its fleecy tenants o'er the glebe.
Cowper, Task, i. 291.

3. In her., same as supporter. A distinction has been made between these terms by alleging that the tenant holds the shield as if keeping it upright, as is usual with modern supporters, but does not support its weight or lift it. (Compare supporter.) Some writers, following the French heralds, use tenant for a human figure holding or flanking the shield, reserving supporter for an animal. Also tenent.—Chief tenant. Same as tenant in capite.—Customary tenant. See customary freehold, under customary.—Kindly tenant. See kindly.—Landlord and Tenant Act. See landlord.—Particular tenant. See particular.—Sole tenant, one who holds in his own sole right, and not with another.—Tenant at sufferance, one who, having been in lawful possession of land, keeps it after the title has come to an end without express agreement with the rightful owner.—Tenant at will, one in possession of lands who holds at the will of the lessor or owner.—Tenant by copy of court-roll, one who is admitted tenant of any lands, etc., within a manor.—Tenant by courtesy. See under courtesy.—Tenant by the verge. See verge.—Tenant for life, life tenant. See estate for life, under estate.—Tenant in capite, tenant in chief. See in capite.—Tenant in common, one who holds lands or chattels in common with another or other persons. See tenancy in common (under tenancy) and estate in joint tenancy (under estate).—Tenant in dower, a widow who possesses land, etc., by virtue of her dower.—Tenant pour auter vie. See auter vie.—Tenants by entireties. See entirety.—Tenant to the præcipe, the person to whom a tenant in tail granted an estate for the express purpose of being made defendant in proceedings to alienate the land by a recovery.

Legal-tender currency, currency which can lawfully be used in paying a debt. All the gold coins of the United States are a legal tender in all payments at their nominal value, when not below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece; and when reduced in weight below such standard tolerance, they are a legal tender at a valuation in proportion to their actual weight. The silver dollar of 412½ grains (though no longer issued) is a legal tender for all debts and dues, public and private, except when otherwise expressly mentioned in the contract. The silver coins of the United States of smaller denomination than one dollar are a legal tender, in sums not exceeding ten dollars, in payment of all dues, public and private. The so-called trade-dollar of 420 grains is not a legal tender. The five-cent and one-cent pieces are a legal tender to the amount of twenty-five cents in one payment. No foreign coins are a legal tender. The United States notes (see greenback) are a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt. Loans and debts contracted before the enactment of the legal-tender law of 1862 authorizing the issue of greenbacks, can be satisfied by payments made in them, unless an express agreement has been made for the payment of gold and silver. Gold certificates, under act of Congress of 1882, are receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued; and silver certificates, under act of 1878, are receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued. Treasury notes, under the act of March 3d, 1863, and of June 30th, 1864, were a legal tender (for their face-value, excluding interest) for all debts, public and private, within the United States, except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt, and except that those issued under the latter act are not legal tender in redemption of bank-notes, or bankers' notes, for circulation as money; those issued under the act of July 14th, 1890, are a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, and are receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued. The term "debts public and private" has been held to intend contract obligations, whether contracted before or after the statute, but not such dues as State taxes. National bank-notes are legal tender in all parts of the United States in payment of taxes, excises, public lands, and all other dues to the United States, except duties on imports, also for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, and associations within the United States, except interest on the public debt and in redemption of the national currency, and also for any debt or liability to any national banking association, except gold-note banks.—Plea of tender, a plea by a defendant that he has made due tender, and has remained always ready to satisfy the plaintiff's claim, and now brings the sum demanded into court.—Tender of amends, an offer by a person who is charged with a wrong or breach of contract to pay a sum of money by way of amends.—Tender of issue, a pleading which in effect invites the adverse party to join issue upon it.

tender[3] (ten'dėr), n. [< tend[2] + -er[1]; partly by apheresis from attender.] 1. One who tends; one who attends to, supervises, or takes care of something; a nurse: as, a machine-tender; a bar*tender*.—2. Naut., a vessel employed to attend a larger one for supplying her with provisions and other stores, or to convey intelligence, orders, etc.

Here she comes i' faith full Sail, with her Fan spread and Streamers out, and a Shoal of Fools for Tenders.
Congreve, Way of the World, ii. 4.

3. A boat or ship accompanying fishing- or whaling-vessels; a lighter. Specifically—(a) In the menhaden-fishery, a vessel or boat employed to carry the fish to the factories. These tenders have an average capacity of 250 barrels, though they are now often built of a larger size, some carrying 600 barrels. (b) A vessel sailing from San Francisco to the Arctic regions, to carry supplies to the whale-ships, and bring back oil and bone, to be sent east by rail.

4. In rail., a carriage attached to the locomotive, for carrying the fuel, water, etc.

I crawled along to the engine and over the tender into the cab. . . . We supplied the tender and fire with wood, and, in short, pretty much ran the train as we pleased.
The Century, XL. 622.

5. A small reservoir attached to a mop or scrubber, to hold a supply of water. The flow is controlled by a valve operated by a spring.

tender-dying (ten'dėr-dī″ing), a. Dying in early youth. Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iii. 3. 48. [Rare.]

tenderee (ten-dėr-ē′), n. [< tender[2] + -ee[1].] The person to whom a tender is made.

Where a tender is made, for the purpose of obtaining property of the owner, sold and in the hands of the tenderee claiming to own the same, and accepted, the money paid may be recovered back. T. Miller, J., in 91 N. Y. 536.

tenderer[1] (ten'dėr-ėr), n. [< tender[1] + -er[1].] One who or that which makes tender: as, a meat-tenderer. Sci. Amer., N. S., LXII. 158. [Recent.]

tenderer[2] (ten'dėr-ėr), n. [< tender[2] + -er[1].] One who makes a tender or offer.

The Minister for Works had met on the previous day a deputation of the "tenderers for the manufacture within the Colony of fifty locomotives required for use on the railways." The Engineer, LXV. 528.

tender-eyed (ten'dėr-īd), a. 1. Having gentle or affectionate eyes.—2. Weak-eyed; bleareyed; dim-sighted.

You must not think your sister
So tender-ey'd as not to see your follies.
Fletcher, Wit without Money, iii. 1.

tenderfoot (ten'dėr-fůt), n.; pl. tenderfoots (-fůts). A new-comer on the plains or in the bush, or one who has not become hardened to the life there; a greenhorn; a novice. [Slang, western U. S. and Australia.]

Hunters . . . who bedizen themselves in all the traditional finery of the craft, in the hope of getting a job at guiding some tenderfoot.
T. Roosevelt, Hunting Trips, p. 32.

tender-footed (ten'dėr-fůt″ed), a. 1. Having tender or sensitive feet.—2. Cautious; timid; "green." Compare tenderfoot. [Slang.]

tender-footedness (ten'dėr-fůt″ed-nes), n. The state of being a tenderfoot. [Slang.]

tender-hearted (ten'dėr-här″ted), a. 1. Having great sensibility; susceptible.

When Rehoboam was young and tenderhearted, and could not withstand them. 2 Chron. xiii. 7.

2. Very susceptible of the softer passions of love, pity, or kindness.

Aumerle, thou weep'st, my tender-hearted cousin!
Shak., Rich. II., iii. 3. 160.

tender-heartedly (ten'dėr-här″ted-li), adv. In a tender-hearted manner; with tender affection.

tender-heartedness (ten'dėr-här″ted-nes), n. The state of being tender-hearted; a tender or compassionate disposition; susceptibility of the softer passions.

tender-hefted† (ten'dėr-hef″ted), a. Apparently an error for tender-hearted.

No, Regan, thou shalt never have my curse;
Thy tender-hefted nature shall not give Thee o'er to harshness. Shak., Lear, ii. 4. 174.

tenderling (ten'dėr-ling), n. [< tender[1] + -ling[1].] 1. A fondling; one made tender by too much coddling; an effeminate person.

Now haue we manie chimnies, and yet our tenderlings complaine of rheumes, catarhs, and poses.
Harrison, Descrip. of Eng., ii. 22.

2. One of the first horns of a deer.

tenderloin (ten'dėr-loin), n. That part of the loin of beef which is tenderer than the rest, in consequence of the softness or fineness of the muscular fiber; the psoas muscle of the ox and some other animals used as meat; the fillet; the undercut. In the tenderloin steak, as usually cut, the bone left in is one lateral half of a lumbar vertebra, of which the long slender bone which separates the tenderloin from the rest of the meat is the transverse process. The tenderloin lies close to the backbone, on the ventral side.

tenderly (ten'dėr-li), adv. [< ME. tenderly, tendirly, tendreliche; < tender[1] + -ly[2].] In a tender manner. (a) With tenderness; mildly; gently; softly; in a manner not to injure or give pain.

The Moor . . .

As asses are. Shak., Othello, i. 3. 407.

(b) Kindly; with pity or affection; fondly.

So eche of theym comaunded other to god full tendirly.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 634.

He cannot be such a monster . . . to his father, that so tenderly and entirely loves him. Shak., Lear, i. 2. 104.

(c) With a keen sense of pain; keenly; bitterly.

There is the Place where Seynt Petir wepte fulle tenderly, aftre that he hadde forsaken oure Lord.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 92.

Pandare that ful tendreliche wepte.
Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 353.

(d) Delicately; effeminately: as, a child tenderly reared.

tender-minded (ten'dėr-mīn″ded), a. Compassionate; tender-hearted.

To be tender-minded
Does not become a sword. Shak., Lear, v. 3. 31.

tenderness (ten'dėr-nes), n. The state or character of being tender, in any sense.

Well we know your tenderness of heart.
Shak., Rich. III., iii. 7. 210.

We went to see the stables and fine horses of wch many were here kept at a vast expense, with all the art and tendernesse imaginable. Evelyn, Diary, July 22, 1670.

Eleven half sheets marbled (like smoke) after a different manner, bit with great curiosity and tenderness.
H. Wanley, in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 276.

There was great tenderness over the bowels, especially in the right iliac region.
J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 156.

tender-sided (ten'dėr-sī″ded), a. Naut., crank, as a vessel; careening too easily under press of sail.

tendinal (ten'di-nal), a. Same as tendinous. [Rare.]

A tendinal slip is shown cut short, of which he says nothing, but which evidently belongs to this muscle.
Science, IX. 624.

tendineal (ten-din'ē-al), a. [< NL. tendo (tendin-), a tendon, + -e-al.] Same as tendinous. [Rare.]

Special development of its tendineal portion aids in strengthening the tensor propatagii. Science, X. 71.

tendines, n. Plural of tendo.

tendinosus (ten-di-nō'sus), n.; pl. tendinosi (-sī). [NL. (sc. musculus): see tendinous.] A muscle of the back of the thigh whose tendon forms one of the inner hamstrings: usually ★called semitendinosus. Coues, 1887.

tendinous (ten'di-nus), a. [< F. tendineux = Sp. Pg. It. tendinoso, < ML. tendinosus, < tendo (tendin-), a tendon: see tendon.] 1. Having a tendon; full of tendons; sinewy.—2. Of or pertaining to tendons; forming or formed by a tendon; fascial; aponeurotic: as, tendinous tissue; a tendinous structure; the tendinous origin or insertion of a muscle.

tendment† (tend'ment), n. [< tend[2] + -ment.] Attendance; care. Bp. Hall, Satires, II. iv.

tendo (ten'dō), n.; pl. tendines (-di-nēz). [NL.: see tendon.] 1. In anat., a tendon.—2. In entom., a bristle on the base of the lower wing, found in many Lepidoptera. In the males of some species it passes through a loop, the hamus or frenulum, on the upper wing. See also hamus.—Tendo Achillis (improp. tendo Achilles). See tendon of Achilles, under tendon.—Tendo oculi, a small white ligament, about one sixth of an inch in length, attached to the nasal process of the superior maxilla, and inserted by two slips into the inner extremities of the tarsal cartilages of the eyelids. ★Also called tendo palpebrarum, internal tarsal ligament.

tendon (ten'don), n. [= F. tendon = Sp. tendón = Pg. tendão = It. tendine, < ML. tendo (tendin-), a tendon, < L. tendere, stretch, extend; cf. Gr. τένων, a sinew, tendon, < τείνειν, stretch: see tend[1].] A band or layer of dense fibrous tissue at the end of a muscle for attachment to a hard part, or interposed between two muscular bellies, usually where the direction of the muscle is changed; a sinew: said especially of such structures when rounded or cord-like, very broad flat tendons being commonly called fasciæ and aponeuroses. Tendons are directly continuous, at one end, with the periosteum, or fibrous investment of bones, and at the other with the fascial tissue which invests and interpenetrates the bundles of muscular tissue. The tissue or substance of tendons is quite like that of ligament, fascia, etc., being dense white fibrous or ordinary connective tissue, usually entirely inelastic and inextensible, though there are some exceptions to this rule. They are attached to bones by perfect continuity of their tissue with the periosteum, and are not notably different from the ligaments of joints. They are the strongest substances of the body, often sustaining strains under which muscle is ruptured and bone fractured. Some tendons are prone to ossify, as those of the leg of the turkey, and all sesamoid bones are ossifications in tendon, as the patella of the knee. See cut under sympelmous.—Achilles tendon. Same as tendon of Achilles.—Achilles tendon reaction. See reaction.—Conjoined tendon, the united tendons of the internal oblique and transversalis muscles at their lower fourth, inserted into the linea alba and pectineal line of the pubis.—Cordiform tendon. See cordiform.—Coronary tendons, the fibrous rings surrounding the arterial orifices of the heart.—Patellar tendon reflex. Same as knee-jerk.—Popliteal tendons. See popliteal.—Tendon-cell, a connective-tissue cell found in tendons and ligaments, disposed in rows or chains parallel to the fiber-bundles.—Tendon-jerk, tendon-reflex. Same as myotatic contraction (which see, under myotatic).—Tendon of Achilles (tendo Achillis), the tendon of the heel; the tendon of the gastrocnemius and soleus muscles, which connects the heel with the calf of the leg, and is the principal extensor of the foot. It was so named because, as fable reports, Thetis, the mother of Achilles, held him by the foot when she dipped him in the river Styx to render him invulnerable, and so the only part about him which was vulnerable was his heel. The tendon of Achilles is that tendon which is cut when a quadruped, as a deer, is hamstrung; but the hamstrings of man are at the back of the knee-joint, and bend the leg upon the thigh, while the tendon of Achilles of any animal, man included, extends the foot upon the leg.—Tendon of Zinn. Same as ligament of Zinn (which see, under ligament).

Ankle and foot from behind, the tendon of the gastrocnemius, helping to form the tendo Achillis, cut away to show the soleus.

tendotome (ten′dō-tōm), n. [< NL. tendo, a tendon, + Gr. -τομος, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] In surg., a tenotome.

tendresse†, n. [ME. tendresse, < OF. (also F.) tendresse (= Pr. tendreza, tenreza = Sp. terneza = It. tenerezza), < tendre, tender: see tender[1].] Tender feeling; tenderness. [In modern use only as French, pron. toṅ-dres′.]

tendril (ten′dril), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also tendrel, tendrell; < OF. tendrille*, F. tendrille, a tendril (cf. OF. tendron, a tendril, shoot: see tendron), < tendre, tender, delicate: see tender[1].]

I. n. In bot., a filiform leafless plant-organ that attaches itself to another body for the purpose of support. Morphologically, a tendril may be a modified stem, as in the vine and Virginia creeper; a modified branch, as in the passion-flower; a petiole, as in Lathyrus Aphaca; a stipule, or, as in Smilax, a pair of stipules; or a leaflet of a compound leaf, as in the pea and vetch. The morphology of the tendrils in the Cucurbitaceæ is still open to question; by Braun and Wydler they are regarded as simple leaves of which the ribs are the branches of the tendril (a view adopted also by Eichler), but Naudin regards the main tendril as cauline and the branches as leaves. Tendrils are usually found on those plants which are too weak in the stem to enable them to grow erect; they twist themselves, usually in a spiral form, around other plants or neighboring bodies, and the plants on which they grow are thus enabled to elevate themselves. See cuts under cirrus, creeper, Lathyrus, passion-flower, and Smilax.

> Her unadorned golden tresses . . . waved,
> As the vine curls her tendrils. Milton, P. L., iv. 307.

Leaf-tendril, a tendril consisting of a modified leaf or part of a leaf—in the latter case appearing to be borne on the leaf, as in the pea.

II. a. Climbing as a tendril, or as by a tendril.

> The curling growth
> Of tendril hops, that flaunt upon their poles.
> Dyer, Fleece, i.

★ tendril-climber (ten′dril-klī′mėr), n. In bot. See climber[1], 2.

tendriled, tendrilled (ten′drild), a. [< tendril + -ed[2].] Having tendrils; provided with tendrils.

> The delicate-tendrilled plant must have something to cling to. George Eliot, Mr. Gilfil, xx.

tendron† (ten′dron), n. [ME., < OF. tendron, a shoot, tendril, also a tender person, F. tendron, a shoot, a girl, gristle, < tendre, tender, delicate: see tender[1]. Cf. tendril.] A stalk or shoot.

> The tendron and the leves [of a pear-tree] of thou folde.
> Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 88.

tendry† (ten′dri), n. [< tender[2] + -y[3].] Offer; proposal; tender. [Rare.]

> This confession, though imperfect, was offered: . . . the like was done also in the tendry of their larger catechism. Heylin, Hist. Presbyterians, p. 473. (Latham.) tendsome (tend′sum), a. [Also tensome; < tend[2] + -some.] Requiring much attendance: as, a tendsome child. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

tenet†, n. and v. See teen[1].

tenebræ (ten′ē-brē), n. pl. [L., darkness, night, gloom; cf. dim.] In the Rom. Cath. Ch., the matins and lauds of the following day, sung on the afternoon or evening of Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday in Holy Week. At the beginning of the office fifteen lighted candles are set on a stand at the epistle side of the altar, one of which is extinguished after each psalm—the highest, however, remaining alight. During the Benedictus the six altar-lights are extinguished, and the lights throughout the church. At the antiphon the light which had been left burning is hidden, and brought out again at the end of the office. These rites symbolize Christ's passion and death, one light remaining as a reminder of his coming resurrection. In the medieval church in England the number of lights on the stand was twenty-four. These ceremonies are as old as the eighth century.

> For Maundy Thursday, as well as for Good Friday and Holy Saturday, the matins and lauds, which in these our times, and all through several by-gone ages, have been called Tenebræ, were sung by the Anglo-Saxons with the same accompaniment as ours, of lighted tapers, to be put out, one by one, as the psalms went on.
> Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. ii. 71.

tenebræ-hearse (ten′ē-brē-hėrs), n. The triangular stand holding the candles to be extinguished one after each psalm in the office of the tenebræ. Also called Lenten hearse.

tenebrarium (ten-ē-brā′ri-um), n.; pl. tenebraria (-ä). [NL., < L. tenebræ, q. v.] Same as tenebræ-hearse.

tenebricose† (tē-neb′ri-kōs), a. [= Pg. It. tenebricoso, < L. tenebricosus, shrouded in darkness, gloomy, < tenebræ, darkness: see tenebræ.] Tenebrous. Bailey.

tenebrific (ten-ē-brif′ik), a. [< L. tenebræ, darkness, + facere, make.] Producing darkness. According to an old fancy, night succeeds to day through the influence of tenebrific stars.

> The chief mystics in Germany, it would appear, are the transcendental philosophers, Kant, Fichte, and Schelling! With these is the chosen seat of mysticism; these are its "tenebrific constellations," from which it doth "ray out darkness" over the earth.
> Carlyle, State of German Lit.

> Now begins
> The tenebrific passage of the tale.
> Browning, Ring and Book, I. 123.

tenebrificous† (ten-ē-brif′i-kus), a. [< tenebrific + -ous.] Tenebrific.

> I could mention several authors who are tenebrificous stars of the first magnitude. Addison, Spectator, No. 582.

Tenebrio (tē-neb′ri-ō), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1758), < L. tenebrio, one who loves darkness (applied to a trickster), < tenebræ, darkness, gloom: see darkness.] 1. A genus of heteromerous beetles, typical of the family Tenebrionidæ, including about 20 species of black elongated beetles with slender legs. The common meal-worm (larva of T. molitor) belongs to this genus, but most of the species live under bark and in decayed trunks of old trees. T. obscurus, indigenous to America, also lives in farinaceous substances, and has been called the American meal-worm to distinguish it from the European meal-worm, T. molitor. Both species, however, are now cosmopolitan. See also cuts under flour-beetle and meal-beetle.

Tenebrio obscurus.

a, larva; b, pupa (line shows natural size); c, beetle; d, antenna of larva; e, maxilla; f, labium; g, terminal segment, showing the dual proleg fully extended.

2. [l. c.] A species of this genus.

Tenebrionidæ (tē-neb-ri-on′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1817), < Tenebrio(n-) + -idæ.] A large and wide-spread family of heteromerous beetles, comprising about 5,000 species, usually of obscure color, but containing some bright tropical forms. They have the anterior coxal cavities closed behind; the ventral segments five, in part connate; the penultimate tarsal joint not spongy, and the tarsal claws simple. The classification of the family is extremely difficult, and the species vary greatly in form and habit. The larvæ, however, are very uniform in structure, and resemble those of the family Elateridæ. The great majority live in decaying vegetation, fungi, and excrement. Some of the largest genera are Blaps, Zophosis, Helops, Strongylium, Pimelia, and Ascida. Eleodes obscura is a representative species. See Tenebrio, and also cut under Blaps.

Eleodes obscura, natural size.

tenebrious† (tē-neb′ri-us), a. [Irreg. for tenebrous.] Same as tenebrous.

> Were moon and stars for villains only made,
> To guide yet screen them with tenebrious light?
> Young, Night Thoughts, ix.

tenebrose (ten′ē-brōs), a. [< L. tenebrosus, dark: see tenebrous.] Dark; gloomy; tenebrous. Bailey, 1727.

tenebrosity (ten-ē-bros′i-ti), n. [< OF. tenebrosite, F. ténébrosité = Sp. tenebrosidad = Pg. tenebrosidade = It. tenebrosità, < ML. tenebrosita(t-)s, darkness, < L. tenebrosus, dark: see tenebrous.] The state of being tenebrous or dark; darkness; gloominess; gloom.

> The antient Poets, in regard of the tenebrositie thereof, compare Hell to a territorie in Italy . . . so inuironed with hills and mountaines that the Sunne is neuer seene at any time of the yeare to shine amongst them.
> Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 389.

tenebrous (ten′ē-brus), a. [< OF. tenebreux, F. ténébreux = Pr. tenebros = Sp. Pg. It. tenebroso, < L. tenebrosus, dark, gloomy, < tenebræ, darkness: see tenebræ.] Dark; gloomy.

> The day at the sixth houre was turned into tenebrous night, insomuch as the Starres were visibly seene in the Firmament. Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 317.

> Huge hail, and water sombre-hued, and snow
> Athwart the tenebrous air pour down amain.
> Longfellow, tr. of Dante's Inferno, vi. 11.

tenebrousness (ten′ē-brus-nes), n. The state of being tenebrous; darkness; gloom. Bailey, 1727.

2. In law, any species of permanent property that may be held of a superior, as lands, houses, rents, commons, an office, an advowson, a franchise, a right of common, a peerage, etc. These are called free tenements or frank-tenements.

> ȝif eny tho that nymeth rente of eny tenement in fraunchyse of the Citee, and his rente holleche be by-hynde, . . . by leue of the baylyues of the town, nyme the dores and the fenestres. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 362.

> The thing holden is . . . styled a tenement, the possessors thereof tenants, and the manner of their possession a tenure. Blackstone, Com., II. v.

3. A dwelling inhabited by a tenant; a dwelling; an abode; a habitation; a home.

> Such is my home—a gloomy tenement,
> More solitary than the peasant's hut
> Upon the barren mountain.
> Hurdis, quoted in Int. to Sir T. More's Utopia, p. liv.

> To sage Philosophy next lend thine ear,
> From Heaven descended to the low-roof'd house
> Of Socrates; see there his tenement.
> Milton, P. R., iv. 274.

4. One of a number of apartments or sets of apartments in one building, each occupied by a separate family, and containing the conveniences of a common dwelling-house.

> The two tenements, it was true, were under the same roof; but they were not on that account the same tenements. D. Webster, Speech in Goodrich Case, April, 1817.

Dominant, servient, etc., tenement. See the adjectives.=Syn. 4. See definitions of flat[2] and apartment.

tenemental (ten-ē-men′tal), a. [< tenement + -al.] Pertaining to a tenement or to tenements; pertaining to what may be held by tenants; capable of being held by tenants.—Tenemental lands, lands held of a feudal lord by free tenures.

> The other, or tenemental, lands they distributed among their tenants. Blackstone, Com., II. vi.

tenementary (ten-ē-men′ta-ri), a. [< ML. tenementarius, < LL. tenementum, a tenement: see tenement.] Capable of being leased; designed for tenancy; held by tenants.

> Such were the Ceorls among the Saxons; but of two sorts, one that hired the Lord's Outland or Tenementary Land . . . like our Farmers.
> Spelman, Feuds and Tenures, vii.

tenement-house (ten′ē-ment-hous), n. A house or block of buildings divided into dwellings occupied by separate families; technically, in the State of New York, any house occupied by more than three families. In ordinary use the word is restricted to such dwellings for the poorer classes in crowded parts of cities.

tenency†, n. An obsolete spelling of tenancy.

A vast, incircumscribed, and swimming knowledge, a notion, a mere implicit and confused tenency of many things, which lie like corn, loose on the floor of their brains.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 367.

tenendas (tē-nen′das), n. [So called from this word in the clause; L. tenendas, acc. pl. fem. of tenendus, gerundive of tenere, hold, possess: see tenant[1].] In Scots law, that clause of a charter by which the particular tenure is expressed. Bell.

tenendum (tē-nen′dum), n. [So called from this word in the clause; L. tenendum, nom. sing. neut. of tenendus, gerundive of tenere, hold, possess: see tenant[1].] In law, that clause in a deed wherein the tenure of the land is defined and limited.

tenent[1] (ten′ent), a. [< L. tenen(t-)s, ppr. of tenere, hold: see tenant[1].] Holding; specifically, in zoöl., used to hold, cling, or support: as, tenent hairs and bristles on the feet of insects.

tenent[2] (ten′ent), n. In her., same as tenant[1], 3.

tenent[3]† (ten′ent), n. [L. tenent, they hold, 3d pers. pl. pres. ind. of tenere, hold: see tenant[1]. Cf. tenet.] Same as tenet.

We shall in our sermons take occasion now and then, where it may be pertinent, to discover the weakness of the puritan principles and tenents to the people.
Bp. Sanderson, Cases of Conscience. (Latham.)

Atheisme and Sadducism disputed;
Their Tenents argued, and refuted.
Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 3.

teneral (ten′ę-ral), a. [< L. tener, soft, delicate, + -al.] In entom., noting the incomplete imago of a neuropterous insect, soon after it has passed from the pupal state, and while it is yet soft. See pseudimago and subimago.

Teneriffe (ten′ę-rif), n. [< Tenerife or Teneriffe, the most important of the Canary Islands, situated west of Africa.] Wine produced in the island of Teneriffe (properly Tenerife), formerly imported into Europe.

Teneriffe slug. See slug[2].

teneritude† (tē-ner′i-tūd), n. [ME., = It. teneritudine, < L. teneritudo (-din-), softness, tenderness, < tener, tender: see tender[1].] Tenderness.

So wol thaire fattenesse and teneritude
With hem [cheese] be stille.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 154.

tenesmic (tē-nes′mik), a. [< tenesmus + -ic.] In med., pertaining to or characterized by tenesmus.

tenesmus (tē-nes′mus), n. [NL., < L. tenesmos, < Gr. τεινεσμός, a straining at stool, < τείνειν, stretch, strain: see tend[1].] In med., a continual inclination to void the contents of the bowels or bladder, accompanied by straining, but with little or no discharge. It is caused by an irritation of the rectum or bladder or adjacent parts, and is a common symptom in dysentery, stricture of the urethra, cystitis, etc.

tenet (ten′et), n. [< L. tenet, he holds, 3d pers. sing. pres. ind. of tenere, hold: see tenant[1]. Cf. habitat. Cf. also tenent[3].] Any opinion, principle, dogma, or doctrine which a person, school, or sect holds or maintains as true.

That all animals of the land are in their kind in the sea, although received as a principle, is a tenet very questionable. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 24.

Though my scheme was not wholly without religion, there was in it no mark of any of the distinguishing tenets of any particular sect. Franklin, Autobiog., p. 141.

In the tenet of justification, the believer is himself in contact with the miracle of Christ's atonement, and applies Christ's merits to himself.
M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, ix.

=Syn. Precept, Dogma, etc. See doctrine.

tenfingers (ten′fing″gėrz), n. A starfish with ten arms. Compare fivefinger, 3.

tenfold (ten′fōld), a. and adv. [< ten + -fold.] Ten times as much or as many.

I will reward thee
Once for thy spritely comfort, and ten-fold
For thy good valour. Shak., A. and C., iv. 7. 15.

ten-forties (ten′fôr′tiz), n. pl. [Short for ten-forty bonds: see def.] The popular name for certain five per cent. bonds issued by the government of the United States in 1864, redeemable at any time after ten years, and payable at the end of forty years.

tengerite (teng′ėr-īt), n. [Named after C. Tenger, a Swedish chemist.] An imperfectly known yttrium carbonate occurring as a white crystalline or earthy incrustation upon gadolinite.

Many more [minerals], such as cyrtolite, molybdite, allanite, tengerite, . . . have been found. Nature, XLI. 163.

tenia, n. See tænia.

teniente† (ten-yen′te), n. [Sp., a lieutenant, a deputy, = E. tenant: see tenant[1].] A lieutenant; a deputy.

Am I your major-domo, your teniente,
Your captain, your commander?
Middleton, Spanish Gypsy, ii. 1.

tenioid, a. See tænioid.

tennantite (ten′ant-īt), n. [Named after Smithson Tennant, an English chemist (1761–1815).] A species closely related to tetrahedrite, or gray copper ore, a mineral of a lead-gray or iron-black color, massive or crystallized, found in Cornwall, England, and elsewhere. It is a sulphid of arsenic with copper and iron, and differs from tetrahedrite in containing arsenic in place of antimony; between the two species there are many intermediate compounds.

Tennant's powder. See powder.

tenné (te-nā′), n. [Heraldic F.: see tawny.] In her., a tincture spoken of as orange-brown, or as produced by mixing red and yellow. It is represented in engraving and drawings in black and white by diagonal lines from the sinister chief to the dexter base, crossed by vertical lines according to most authorities, or by horizontal lines according to Berry. Also tenney, tawny.

tenner (ten′ėr), n. A ten-pound note. [Slang, Great Britain.]

And you don't like me well enough to borrow a few tenners just to carry on the war with?
Miss Braddon, Rupert Godwin, I. 221.

Tennesseean (ten-e-sē′an), a. and n. [< Tennessee (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Tennessee. See II.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Tennessee, one of the southern United States, lying south of Kentucky.

Tennessee bond cases. See case[1].

tenney (ten′e), n. In her., same as tenné.

tennis (ten′is), n. [Early mod. E. also tennise, tennys, tennes, tenis, tenys, tenyse; < ME. tenys, teneys (ML. tenisia; also teniludium, 'tennis-play'); appar. of OF. origin, but no OF. term appears. The notion that the word is derived from OF. tenez, 'hold' or 'take' (i. e. 'take this ball'), conjectured to be a cry of the player who serves, is purely imaginary, and it is inconsistent with the usage of the time (ME. nouns were not formed offhand from OF. imperatives).] 1. A very old and elaborate ball-game played by two, three, or four persons in a building specially constructed for the purpose. The court (96 feet by 32) is surrounded by a wall, from which a sloping roof called the penthouse extends on three sides to an inner wall 7 feet high; and a net 5 feet high at the ends to 3 in the middle is placed across the court. The first player (the server) hits a ball with a racket so that it strikes the penthouse or the wall above it, and rebounds into the court on his opponent's side of the net. The opposing player (the striker-out) has to strike the ball back into the server's court before it strikes the ground, or on its first bound. The player who is the first to drive the ball into the net or beyond the prescribed boundary loses a stroke. If a player fails to return the ball before it strikes the ground twice, a chase is noted against him on the marked floor. This does not count at the time, but a stroke may be won or lost from it by subsequent play. When two chases have been made, or when the score of one side reaches 40, the players change ends. Strokes are won and lost in various other ways besides those mentioned above (as by driving the ball into certain openings in the inner wall), the game being extremely complicated. The mode of scoring (by 15, 30, 40, and game, with deuce and advantage) has been taken from this game by lawn-tennis. Tennis arose in Europe during the middle ages, and was very popular. It is now played under the name of court-tennis, to distinguish it from lawn-tennis. See racket[2] and lawn-tennis.

Item, that no man pley at tenys or pame withyn the yeld halle. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 372.

I had as leve tosse a ball here alone as to play at the tenys over the corde with the. Palsgrave, p. 760.

Tennis is a game of no use in itself, but of great use in respect it maketh a quick eye and a body ready to put itself into all postures.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 172.

2. Same as lawn-tennis.

tennis† (ten′is), v. t. [< tennis, n.] To drive, as a ball in playing tennis.

These fowre garrisons issuing foorthe, at such convenient times as they shall have intelligence or espiall upon the enemye, will so drive him from one side to another, and tennis him amongest them, that he shall finde no where safe to keep his creete [cattle].
Spenser, State of Ireland.

tennis-arm (ten′is-ärm), n. A lameness of tennis-players, said to be caused by a rupture of some of the fibers of the pronator radii teres.

tennis-ball (ten′is-bâl), n. The ball used in tennis or lawn-tennis.

Rather (O Iacob) chuse we all to die,
Than to betray our Native Libertie;
Than to becom the sporting Tennis-ball
Of a proud Monarch.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Captaines.

To the Ianizaries furie, who made Tennis-balls of their heads. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 287.

tennis-court (ten′is-kōrt), n. 1. An oblong edifice in which the game of tennis is played. See tennis, 1.

The more spacious that the tennis-court is,
The more large is the hazard.
Webster, Devil's Law-Case, ii. 3.

2. The court upon which the game of lawn-tennis is played.

tennis-elbow (ten′is-el″bō), n. Same as tennis-arm.

tenno (ten′ō), n. [Jap. tenno, heavenly ruler, < ten (< Chinese tien), heaven, + wō (< Chinese hwang), august ruler.] The king of heaven; emperor: same as Chinese tien hwang: a title first adopted in Japan in 782.

ten-o'clock (ten′ō-klok′), n. The common star-of-Bethlehem, Ornithogalum umbellatum: so called from the tardy opening of the flowers. Compare four-o'clock.

tenography (tē-nog′ra-fi), n. [Irreg. < Gr. τένων, a tendon (cf. tendon), + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] The description of tendons.

tenology (tē-nol′ō-ji), n. [Irreg. < Gr. τένων, a tendon, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] ★That part of anatomy which relates to tendons.

tenon (ten′on), n. [Formerly also, irreg., tenant; < ME. tenoun, < OF. (and F.) tenon, a tenon, < tenir, hold, < L. tenere, hold, keep: see tenant[1].] The projecting end of a piece of wood or other material fitted for insertion into a corresponding cavity or mortise in another piece, in order to form a secure joint. See cuts under breech-pin, dovetail, and mortise.—Shoulder of a tenon, the transverse section of a timber, from which the tenon projects. (See also tease-tenon, tusk-tenon.)

tenon (ten′on), v. t. [< tenon, n.] 1. To fit for insertion into a mortise, as the end of a piece of timber.—2. To join by or as by a tenon.

We tenon both these together as an antecedent and consequent. Bp. Andrews, Sermons, II. 86. (Davies.) tenon-auger (ten′on-â″gėr), n. A hollow auger for cutting circular tenons, as in the movable rollers for window-shades, etc.

tenoner (ten′on-ėr), n. A machine for forming tenons. Such machines are usually combinations of saws, or saws with cutter-heads and cutters for forming the tenon; a tenoning-machine; also, a wood-turners' hand-tool.

Tenonian (te-nō′ni-an), a. [< Tenon (see def.) + -ian.] In anat., relating to the French anatomist J. R. Tenon (1724–1816): as, the Tenonian fascia or capsule (Tenon's capsule).

tenoning-chisel (ten′on-ing-chiz″el), n. A double-bladed chisel which makes two cuts, leaving a middle piece to form a tenon.

tenoning-machine (ten′on-ing-ma-shēn″), n. In wood-working, a general name for a variety of power-tools and hand machines for cutting square or round tenons in car-frames and wheel-spokes; a tenoner. They employ saws, revolving cutters, hollow augers, and, in some instances, chisels.

tenonitis (ten-ō-nī′tis), n. [< Tenon (see Tenonian) + -itis.] Inflammation of Tenon's capsule.

tenon-saw (ten′on-sâ), n. A thin back-saw having eight teeth to the inch, used for fine, accurate sawing, as in forming tenons, dovetails, miters, etc. Also called tenor-saw.

Tenon's capsule. A tunic of fascia, containing smooth muscular fibers, around the middle of the eyeball, blending with the sclerotic behind the entrance of the ciliary vessels and nerves into the eyeball; the Tenonian fascia.

tenor (ten′or), n. and a. [Formerly also tenour, sometimes tennure; < ME. tenour, tenor, tenoure, < OF. tenour, teneur = Pr. Sp. tenor = Pg. teor = It. tenore, < L. tenor, a holding on, uninterrupted sense, tone, accent, ML. also, in music, the chief melody (cantus firmus), hence the highest adult male voice, to which the chief melody was assigned; < tenere, hold: see tenant[1].] I. n. 1. General, usual, or prevailing course or direction.

Along the cool, sequester'd vale of life
They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.
Gray, Elegy.

The chief event in the course of the summer which broke the even tenor of our lives was a first visit from our great neighbors, Lord and Lady Carlisle.
Lady Holland, Sydney Smith, viii.

2. General course or drift of a thought, saying, discourse, or the like; that course of thought or meaning which holds on or runs through a whole discourse, treatise, statute, or the like; general purport; substance.

Thenne he cryed so cler that kenne myȝt alle;
The trwe tenor of his teme he tolde on this wyse.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), iii. 358.

Mark the tenor of my style,
Which shall such trembling hearts unfold
As seldom hath to-fore been told.
B. Jonson, Case is Altered, i. 1.

The tennure of this letter was That Robbin would submit.
True Tale of Robin Hood (Child's Ballads, V. 366).

Emigration to the new countries was encouraged by the liberal tenor of the royal ordinances passed from time to time. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 9.

3. In law: (a) True intent and meaning; purport and effect: as, the tenor of a deed or instrument of any kind is its purport and effect, but not its actual words. (b) A transcript or copy. It implies that a correct copy is set out, and therefore at common law, under an allegation according to the tenor, the instrument must be set out correctly.

4. Character; nature.

All of a tenor was their after-life,
No day discoloured with domestic strife.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., iii. 1148.

5. In music: (a) The highest variety of the ordinary adult male voice. Its compass usually extends about two octaves or less from the first C below middle C. Its quality is properly thin and penetrating, bearing much the same relation to bass that soprano does to alto. Its upper tones often much resemble the middle tones of alto. A tenor voice having somewhat of the breadth and sonority of a barytone is often called (in Italian) a tenore robusto, while a light, agile tenor is called a tenore leggiero. (b) A singer with such a voice, or a voice-part intended for or sung by such a voice. In ordinary part-writing the tenor is the third voice-part, intermediate between the alto and the bass. (c) An instrument playing a third part; specifically, the viola (which see). (d) In medieval music, also, (1) the hold or pause on a final tone of a piece; (2) the ambitus or compass of a mode; (3) the repercussion of a mode.—Action of proving the tenor. See proving.—Middle tenor, Massachusetts paper currency, 1737–40. See new tenor (b).—New tenor. (a) In the financial history of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, a form of paper currency of the public issues which began in 1737 in the former colony and in 1740 in the latter, and of which each bill bore a declaration that it should be equal in value to a stated amount of coined silver or of gold coin. (b) In Massachusetts, a new form of such currency, issued in accordance with an act of the year 1741 and subsequent years, and differing but slightly from that above described. The notes of this emission received the name of new tenor, which caused the preceding series, which had hitherto borne that name, to be thenceforth called middle tenor.—Old tenor, in the financial history of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, a form of paper currency of the public issues which preceded one of 1737 in the former colony and one of 1740 in the latter, and of which each bill bore a declaration that it should be in value equal to money.

II. a. In music, of or pertaining to the tenor; adapted for singing or playing the tenor: as, a tenor voice; a tenor instrument; a tenor part.—Tenor bassoon, cornet, drum, horn, trombone, trumpet, etc., varieties of these several instruments whose size and compass make them intermediate between the alto and bass varieties.—Tenor bell, the chief bell in a set of bells.—Tenor C, in music, the next C below middle C.—Tenor clef, in musical notation, a C clef placed on ★ the fourth line of a staff.—Tenor violin. Same as viola.

tenore (te-nō′re), n. [It.: see tenor.] See tenor.

tenorino (ten-ọ-rē′nō), n.; pl. tenorini (-nē). [It., dim. of tenore, tenor: see tenor.] A falsetto tenor voice, or a singer with such a voice; particularly, an artificial soprano.

tenorist (ten′ọr-ist), n. [= OF. tenoriste, < ML. tenorista; as tenor + -ist.] One who sings a tenor part, or one who plays on a tenor instrument.

tenorite (ten′ọr-īt), n. [Named by Semmola in 1841 after Signor Tenore, president of the Academy of Sciences at Naples.] Native oxid of copper, occurring in steel-gray scales of metallic luster on lava at Vesuvius.

tenoroon (ten-ọ-rön′), n. and a. [< tenor + -oon, as bassoon from bass.] I.† n. Same as oboe da caccia (which see, under oboe).

II. a. In organ-building, noting a stop which does not extend below tenor C: as, a tenoroon hautboy.

tenorrhaphy (tē-nor′a-fi), n. [< Gr. τένων, tendon, + ῥαφή, a seam, < ῥάπτειν, sew.] Same as tenosuture.

tenosuture (ten′ọ-sū″tūr), n. [< Gr. τένων, tendon, + L. sutura, a seam: see suture.] The fastening together by suture of the ends of a divided tendon. Also tenorrhaphy.

tenotome (ten′ọ-tōm), n. [< F. ténotome, < Gr. τένων, tendon, + -τομος, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut. Cf. tenotomy.] In surg., a slender knife specially suitable for the subcutaneous division of a tendon; a tenotomy knife. Also tendotome.

tenotomize (tē-not′ọ-mīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. tenotomized, ppr. tenotomizing. [< tenotomy + -ize.] To divide a tendon or the tendons of.

tenotomy (tē-not′ọ-mi), n. [= F. ténotomie, < Gr. τένων, tendon, + -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut. Cf. tendon.] In surg., the division of a tendon.

High degrees of muscular insufficiency cannot be corrected except by surgical measures: viz., tenotomy of one or both external recti muscles.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, V. 96.

tenpenny (ten′pen″i), a. Valued at or worth ten pence.—Tenpenny nail. See penny, 6.

tenpins (ten′pinz), n. The game of bowls played with ten pins or men in a long alley. The players strive with three or fewer bowls of the ball to knock down all the pins.

ten-pounder (ten′poun″dėr), n. 1. See pounder[1], 1 and 2.

Between 1832 and 1865 the ten-pounders rose to 463,000.
Gladstone.

2. Something that weighs ten pounds.—3. The big-eyed herring, Elops saurus. See cut under Elops.

tenrec, tanrec (ten′rek, tan′rek), n. [Malagasy tándraka.] 1. A Madagascar hedgehog; any insectivorous mammal of the Centetidæ, as Tenrec (Centetes ecaudatus).

Centetes ecaudatus, Ericulus spinosus, and Echinops telfairi. The rice-tenrec is Oryzoryctes hova. Also tang. See cut under sokinah. These animals are highly characteristic of the Madagascar region. They superficially resemble ordinary hedgehogs (of the different family Erinaceidæ—compare cut under Erinaceus), but their structure is peculiar, and their nearest relatives are the West Indian solenodons.

Tenrec (Ericulus spinosus).

2. [cap.] [NL. (Lacépède, 1798), and in the form Tanrecus (Desmarest, 1825).] A generic name for the species of Centetidæ: same as Centetes in a former broad sense. [Not used.]

tense[1] (tens), n. [Formerly also tence; < ME. tens, temps, < OF. tans, tens, tenzs, tems, temps, F. temps = Sp. tiempo = Pg. It. tempo, < L. tempus, time, in grammar tense. Cf. temporal[1], temporary, etc.] 1†. Time. See temps.

I warne yow wel, it is to seken ever,
That future temps hath maad men to dissever
In trust therof from al that ever they hadde.
Chaucer, Prol. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 322.

2. In gram.: (a) Time. (b) One of the forms, or sets of forms, which a verb takes in order to indicate the time of action or of that which is affirmed: extended also to forms indicating the nature of the action as continued, completed, and the like. In English this is effected either by internal vowel change, as in sing, sang, lead, led; by terminational inflection, as in love, loved; or, in verb-phrases, by means of auxiliary words, as in did love, have loved, will love.

We may say now that we have Treasurers of all Tenses, for there are four living, to wit the Lords Manchester, Middlesex, Marlborough, and the newly chosen.
Howell, Letters, I. v. 2.

At prime tense, at the first time; at first; instantly.

My silf I knowe fulle wel Daungere,
And how he is feers of his cheere,
At prime temps Love to manace.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 3378.

Men shulde hym snybbe bitterly
At pryme temps of his folye.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 4533.

Future, perfect, pluperfect, present tense. See the adjectives.—Historical tenses. See historical, 4.—Sequence or consecution of tenses. See sequence.

tense[2] (tens), a. [= Sp. tenso, < L. tensus, pp. of tendere, stretch: see tend[1].] Being in a state of tension; stretched until tight; strained to stiffness; rigid; not lax: often used figuratively.

For the free passage of the sound into the ear it is requisite that the tympanum be tense.
Holder, Elements of Speech, p. 161.

Her temples were sunk, her forehead was tense, and a fatal paleness sat upon her cheek.
Goldsmith, Vicar, xxviii.

Tense abdomen, in entom., an abdomen neither divided into segments nor having segments indicated, as in most spiders, by transverse folds.

tense[2] (tens), v. t.; pret. and pp. tensed, ppr. tensing. [< tense[2], a.] To make tense or taut. [Rare.]

If, instead of a symmetrical movement, the other hand made a maximal effort of tensing the extensor instead of the flexor muscles of the hand, . . . no constant effect . . . was observed. Mind, IX. 109.

tenseless (tens′les), a. [< tense[1] + -less.] Having no tense: as, a tenseless verb. Classical Rev., III. 9.

tenselessness (tens′les-nes), n. The character of being tenseless. Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 59.

tensely (tens′li), adv. In a tense manner; with tension.

tenseness (tens′nes), n. The state of being tense, or stretched to stiffness; stiffness; rigidness.

tensibility (ten-si-bil′i-ti), n. [< tensible + -ity (see -bility).] The property of being tensible or ductile.

tensible (ten′si-bl), a. [= Sp. tensible, < ML. tensibilis, that can be stretched, < L. tendere, pp. tensus, stretch: see tend[1], tense[2].] Capable of being extended or drawn out; ductile.

Gold . . . is the closest (and therefore the heaviest) of metals, and is likewise the most flexible and tensible.
★ Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 327.

tensile (ten′sil), a. [= It. tensile, < NL. tensilis*, < L. tendere, pp. tensus, stretch: see tend[1], tense[2].] 1. Of or pertaining to tension: as, tensile strength.—2. Capable of tension; capable of being drawn out or extended in length or breadth; tensible.

All bodies ductile, and tensile [as metals, that will be drawn into wires], . . . have in them the appetite of not discontinuing. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 845.

3. In musical instruments, producing tones by means of stretched strings.

tensiled (ten′sild), a. [< tensile + -ed[2].] Made tensile; rendered capable of tension. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

tensility (ten-sil′i-ti), n. [< tensile + -ity.] The quality of being tensile; tensibility. Dr. ★H. More, Immortal. of Soul, ii. 10.

tension (ten′shon), n. [= F. tension = Sp. tensión = Pg. tensão = It. tensione, < L. tensio(n-), a stretching, ML. also a struggle, contest (see tenson), < tendere, pp. tensus, stretch, extend: see tend[1], tense[2].] 1. The act of stretching, straining, or making tense; the state of being stretched or strained to stiffness; the condition of being bent or strained.

Voice being raised by stiffe tension of the larynx.
Holder, Elements of Speech, p. 74.

2. In mech., stress, or the force by which a bar, rod, string, or the like is pulled when forming part of any system in equilibrium or in motion.

In a large suspension bridge the tension produced by the occasional load is usually only a small fraction of that produced by the permanent load.
R. S. Ball, Exper. Mechanics, p. 232.

3. In physics, a constrained condition of the particles of bodies, arising from the action of antagonistic forces, in which they tend to return to their former condition; elastic force. Tension may be present in a solid body, and also in a liquid in the case of surface-tension (which see), but not in a gas. What is commonly called the tension of a gas is properly its pressure simply—due, according to the kinetic theory of gases (see gas, 1), to the innumerable impacts of the moving molecules against the confining surface; good writers avoid the use of tension in this sense.

4. In statical elect., the mechanical stress across a dielectric, due to accumulated charges, as in a condenser; hence, the same as surface-density (the amount of electricity at any point of the surface of a charged conductor); more commonly used, in dynamical electricity, to mean about the same as difference of potential: thus, a current of high tension is popularly a current of high electromotive force.

These experiments show very clearly that the sign of electrification of the surface at which the discharge begins has a great effect on the limiting tension. The discharge passes much more readily from a small ball to a large one when the former is negative than when it is positive. Encyc. Brit., VIII. 61.

Potential is the scientific term for the electrical condition for which the word tension has been used. Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXV. 57.

5. Mental strain, stretch, or application; strong or severe intellectual effort; strong excitement of feeling; great activity or strain of the emotions or the will.

When the tension of mind relating to their daily affairs was over, they sunk into fallow rest. Mrs. Gaskell, North and South, xl.

In desiring the mind is in a state of active tension. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 579.

The states of tension have as positive an influence as any in determining the total condition, and in deciding what the psychosis shall be. W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 235.

6. A strained state of any kind: as, political tension; social tension.—7. An attachment to a sewing-machine for regulating the strain of the thread. It is made in a variety of forms, the aim being in all cases to put a pressure on the thread to prevent it from running from the spool too freely, and to adjust the strain on the thread to the thickness of the cloth.—Initial tension. See initial.—Surface tension. See surface-tension.

tension (ten′shon), v. t. [< tension, n.] To make tense; give the right degree of tension to; draw out; strain. The Engineer, LXXI. 120. [Recent.]

tensional (ten′shon-al), a. [< tension + -al.] Of or pertaining to tension; of the nature of tension.

Such members of a structure as are subject to torsional, tensional, or transverse stresses. W. H. Greenwood, Steel and Iron, p. 71.

tension-bar (ten′shon-bär), n. A bar by means of which a strain of tension is applied, or by which such a strain is resisted. See cut under car-truck.

tension-bridge (ten′shon-brij), n. 1. Same as bowstring-bridge. E. H. Knight.—2. A form of bridge formerly used for street spans, consisting essentially of wooden pieces anchored at the ends, and strained to maintain them as nearly level as possible. E. H. Knight.

tension-fuse (ten′shon-fūz), n. See fuse[2].

tension-member (ten′shon-mem″bėr), n. A rod, bar, or beam forming a member of a frame, truss, beam, or girder, and serving to resist a tensile strain.

tension-rod (ten′shon-rod), n. A rod in a truss or structure which connects opposite parts and keeps them from spreading asunder.

tension-roller (ten′shon-rō″lėr), n. An idler, or free pulley, resting against a belt for the purpose of keeping it stretched tight against its working pulleys; a tightening-pulley. See cut under idle-wheel.

tension-spicule (ten′shon-spik″ūl), n. In sponges, a flesh-spicule or microsclere. Bowerbank.

tension-spring (ten′shon-spring), n. A spring formed of inner and outer leaves, of which the latter are not connected at the middle with the former, all being secured together at the ends. A pressure upon the outer leaves induces a tensile strain upon the inner ones, which, when stretched to a straight line, form chords to the outer leaves, and thus limit the yielding of the spring. E. H. Knight.

tensity (ten′si-ti), n. [< tense[2] + -ity.] The state of being tense; tenseness. Imp. Dict.

tensive (ten′siv), a. [< F. tensif = Pg. It. tensivo; as tense[2] + -ive.] Giving the sensation of tension, stiffness, or contraction.

A tensive pain from distension of the parts. Floyer, Preternatural State of Animal Humours.

tensome (ten′sum), a. Same as tendsome.

tenson (ten′son), n. [Also tenzon; < F. tenson = Pr. tenso = Pg. tensão = It. tenzone, < L. tensio(n-), a stretching, ML. also a struggle, contention: see tension.] A contention in verse between rival troubadours, before a tribunal of love or gallantry; hence, a subdivision of a chanson composed by one of the contestants or competitors; also, one of the pieces of verse sung by the competitors, for which a peculiar meter was thought appropriate.

While, out of dream, his day's work went
To tune a crazy tenzon or sirvent.
Browning, Sordello, ii.

tensor (ten′sor), n. and a. [NL., < L. tendere, pp. tensus, stretch: see tend[1], tense[2].] I. n.; pl. tensores (ten-sō′rēz). 1. In anat., one of several muscles which tighten a part, or make it tense, or put it upon the stretch: differing from an extensor in not changing the relative position or direction of the axis of the part: opposed to laxator.—2. In math., the modulus of a quaternion; the ratio in which it stretches the length of a vector. If the quaternion is put into the form $xi + yj + zk + w$, the tensor is $\sqrt{(x^2 + y^2 + z^2 + w^2)}$. If the quaternion is expressed as a matrix, the tensor is the square root of the determinant of the matrix. Abbreviated T.—Right tensor. See right.—Tensor fasciæ latæ. Same as tensor vaginæ femoris.—Tensor laminæ posterioris vaginæ recti abdominis, small anomalous muscular slips arising near the internal inguinal opening, and inserted into the transversalis fascia beneath the rectus abdominis.—Tensor palati. Same as circumflexus palati. See palatum.—Tensor parapatagii, in ornith., the tightener of the parapatagium, a propatagial slip of the cucullar muscle which joins the propatagialis longus; the dermotensor patagii.—Tensor patagii, tensor plicæ alaris, a muscle of birds which stretches the fold of skin on the front border of the wing, in the reëntrance between the upper arm and the forearm: several modifications of such a muscle are described, and made use of to some extent in classifying birds.—Tensor propatagii brevis or longus. Same as propatagialis brevis or longus. See propatagialis.—Tensor tarsi. See tarsus.—Tensor trochleæ, the tightener of the pulley of the trochlear or superior oblique muscle of the eyeball, a small muscle occasionally found in man.—Tensor tympani, a muscle supposed to increase the tension of the membrani tympani by acting upon the malleus: it arises from the petrous section of the temporal bone, and adjacent parts, passes through a bony canal parallel with the Eustachian tube, enters the tympanum, and is attached to the handle of the malleus. Also called malleâdius.—Tensor vaginæ femoris, a muscle which acts upon the sheath of the thigh, in man arising from the anterior superior spine of the ilium, and inserted into the deep femoral fascia. It presents many modifications in other animals, being wanting in some, or connected with the panniculus carnosus, or external abdominal muscle, or blended with gluteal muscles. It belongs to the latter group, and not to the muscles of the front of the thigh, with which it is usually associated in human anatomy. Also called tensor fasciæ latæ, and vaginiglutæus. See cut under muscle[1].

II. a. In anat., noting certain muscles whose function is to render fasciæ or other structures tense.

tensor-twist (ten′sor-twist), n. In Clifford's biquaternions, a twist multiplied by a tensor.

ten-strike (ten′strīk), n. In American bowling, a stroke which knocks down all the ten pins; hence, figuratively, a stroke or act of any kind which is entirely successful or decisive.

tensure† (ten′sūr), n. [< LL. tensura, a stretching, straining, < L. tendere, pp. tensus, stretch, strain: see tend[1], tense[2].] A stretching or straining; tension.

This motion upon the pressure, and the reciprocal thereof, which is motion upon tensure, we use to call motion of liberty, which is when any body, being forced to a preternatural extent, . . . restoreth itself to be natural. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 12.

★ tent[1] (tent), n. [< ME. tente, < OF. tente, tende, F. tente = Pr. tenda = Sp. tienda = Pg. It. tenda, < ML. tenta, tenda, also tentum, a tent, also a place where clothes are spread out to dry, prop. fem. of L. tentus, pp. of tendere, stretch: see tend[1]. Cf. L. tentonum, a tent, from the same verb.] 1. A covering or shelter, or a portable lodge, made of some flexible material, as skins, coarse cloth, or canvas, supported by one or more poles, and stretched by means of cords secured to tent-pegs, or in some other way. Wandering tribes, as those of Asia, use tents for their common habitation. Among European nations the chief use of tents, which are generally made of canvas, is for soldiers in the field, the larger and more commodious kind being for the use of general officers. Tents are also used in towns to shelter large occasional assemblies, as the spectators at a circus or the audience at a political or religious gathering, and in woods or uninhabited regions by campers or explorers. Large and permanent tents, such as are raised on posts, are known as pavilions, and those of an elaborate and decorative character, such as are set up for outdoor entertainments, are called marquees.

And theise solempne Festes ben made with outen, in Hales and Tentes made of Clothes of Gold and of Tartaries, fulle nobely. Mandeville, Travels, p. 233.

It was upon the Plain of Mamre, . . .
. . . whereas the Angels came
To Abraham in his tent, and there with him did feed.
Drayton, Polyolbion, iii. 145.

2†. A habitation; a dwelling.

Bountee so fix hath in thyn herte his tente
That wel I wot thou wolt my socour be.
Chaucer, A. B. C., l. 9.

3. A raised wooden box or platform set up in the open air, from which clergymen formerly used to preach when the hearers were too numerous to be accommodated within doors: still sometimes used. [Scotch.]

Ev'n godly meetings o' the saunts,
By thee inspir'd,
When gaping they besiege the tents,
Are doubly fir'd. Burns, Scotch Drink.

4. An apparatus used in field-photography as a substitute for the dark room. It commonly consists of a tripod supporting a box with a window of red or orange glass or fabric in front, and furnished with drapery at the back, so as to cover the operator and prevent access of white light to the interior. It is generally fitted with shelves and trays for holding various necessary appliances. Now that the dry-plate has superseded the collodion process, it is very seldom used, and when used it is much simpler and lighter than the tent for wet plates, consisting usually of a small box, with sleeves through which the hands and arms are thrust for the purpose of changing the plates in the holders for fresh ones without exposure to light. In the latter form usually called changing-box.—A-tent, a kind of tent formed by two upright poles and a ridge-pole, and having its sides sloping to the ground without any vertical wall, thus roughly resembling the letter A.—Bell tent, a tent circular in plan, with a single pole in the middle: so called from its shape.—Dark tent. See def. 4.—Hospital tent, a large tent used as a field-hospital.—Shelter-tent, a kind of tent, easily put up and removed, used by the rank and file of an army on the march. The tent consists of four or more pieces of canvas which button to one another, and can be put up by means of saplings or poles that may be carried with the army. Each piece of canvas is carried by one man on his knapsack, and the number of men covered by each shelter-tent corresponds to the number of pieces.—Sibley tent, a light conical tent having a ventilator at the top. It admits of a fire being made in the center, and will accommodate twelve men with their accoutrements, the men sleeping with their feet to the fire: named from Major H. H. Sibley, United States Dragoons.—Wall-tent, a tent which has low upright walls formed of hanging curtains of canvas, the sloping top not reaching as far as the tent-pegs.

tent[1] (tent), v. i. [< tent[1], n.] To pitch one's tent; live in or as in a tent.

The smiles of knaves
Tent in my cheeks, and schoolboys' tears take up
The glasses of my sight. Shak., Cor., iii. 2. 116.

We will be gone for some days probably, tenting it in the open air. Kane, Sec. Grinnell Exp., I. 357.

Where the red chieftain tented
In the days that are gone.
R. W. Gilder, Ballad of the Chimney.

tent[2] (tent), v. t. [< ME. tenten, also tempten, < OF. tenter, tempter, tanter, F. tenter = Sp. Pg. tentar = It. tentare, try, tempt, < L. tentare, temptare, handle, touch, feel, try, test, tempt, etc., freq. of tenere, pp. tentus, hold (see tenant[1]), or, according to some, of tendere, pp. tentus or tensus, stretch: see tend[1]. Cf. tempt, the same word in another form.] 1†. To try; test.

Telamon, the tore kyng, tentes hir so wele,
And is fuerser of folke by a felle nowmber,
And lappis in hir loue, that leue hir he nyll.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 3147.

2. To probe; sound.

Search my wound deeper; tent it with the steel
That made it. Webster, White Devil, v. 2.

I have a sword dares tent a wound as far
As any. Shirley, Maid's Revenge, iii. 6.

3. To apply a tent or pledget to; keep open with a tent.

I have been bred in Paris, and learned my humanities and my cursus medendi as well as some that call themselves learned leeches. Methinks I can tent this wound, and treat it with emollients. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth, vii.

4†. To tempt. See tempt.

Euelle spiritis is neghand full nere,
That will 3ou tarie at this tyme with his tentyng.
York Plays, p. 243.

tent[2] (tent), n. [< ME. tente, < OF. (and F.) tente = Sp. tienta = Pg. It. tenta, < ML. tenta, a probe, a tent for a wound; from the verb: see tempt.] 1†. A probe.

Modest doubt is call'd
The beacon of the wise, the tent that searches
To the bottom of the worst.
Shak., T. and C., ii. 2. 16.

2. In surg., a piece of some fabric, bunch of horsehairs or threads, or small cylinder of sponge, laminaria, or other substance introduced into some opening, either natural (as the cervical canal of the uterus) or artificial (as a wound), to keep it open or increase its caliber.

Thou speakest lyke a good Chyrurgian, but dealest lyke one vnskilfull; for, making a great wound, thou puttest in a small tent. Lyly, Euphues and his England, p. 365.

Tangle tent. See tangle[1].

tent[3]† (tent), v. t. [< ME. tenten, stretch; a var. of tenden*, < L. tendere, stretch (see tend[1], and cf. tent[1]); or developed from tenter[2], ME. tenture: see tenter[2].] To stretch, as cloth. Prompt. Parv., p. 489.

tent[4] (tent), n. [< ME. tent; an aphetic form of atente, E. attent, or of entente, E. intent.] 1. Heed; care; notice; attention: usually in the phrase to take tent. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

Tyl Y come, take tent to redyng, to exortacioun, and teching. Wyclif, 1 Tim. iv. 13.

The high parliament
Of Heaven; where Seraphim take tent
Of ordering all.
B. Jonson, Underwoods, cii. 1.

2†. Intent; purpose.

Alisaundrine to cunseile thei clepud sone thanne, & telden hire trewli what tent thei were inne.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 1662.

tent[4] (tent), v. [< ME. tenten; a var. of tend[2], or ult. of attend: see tent[4], n.] I. intrans. To take heed; be careful: generally with to. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

But warily tent, when you come to court me,
An' come na unless the back yett be a-jee.
Burns, Oh Whistle an' I'll come to you, my Lad.

II. trans. 1. To observe; take note of; give heed to. [Scotch.]

Owre lorde comaunded vs bothe
To tente the tree of his.
York Plays, p. 25.

If there 's a hole in a' your coats,
I rede you tent it:
A chield 's amang you taking notes,
An', faith, he'll prent it.
Burns, Captain Grose's Peregrinations.

2†. To attend; tend upon; take care of.

Saue the lordys chambur, tho wadrop to,
Tho vssher of chambur schalle tent tho two.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 312.

tent[5] (tent), n. [< Sp. tinto (= F. teint, dyed, colored), < L. tinctus, pp. of tingere, dye: see tint.] A kind of wine of a deep-red color, chiefly from Galicia or Malaga in Spain, much used as a sacramental wine. Also tent-wine.

tentacle (ten'ta-kl), n. [= F. tentacule = Sp. tentáculo, < NL. tentaculum, a feeler, tentacle, < L. tentare, handle, touch, feel, test, try: see tent[2], tempt.] 1. In zoöl., some or any elongated and comparatively slender or flexible process or appendage of an animal, used as an organ of touch, or for exploration, prehension, and sometimes locomotion; a feeler; a tentaculum. The name covers a great variety of organs having little or no structural relationship, as horns, antennæ, proboscides, rays, and arms. Specifically—(a) One of the barbs, barbels, or other tactile organs about the mouth or head of a fish. (b) One of the arms of a cephalopod. (c) A kind of proboscis of many worms. (d) One of the arms or rays of a crinoid. (e) One of the cirrous legs of a cirriped. (f) One of the long horns, antennæ, or feelers of some crustaceans, as lobsters. (g) The antenna of many insects, especially when long and slender, as in a cricket or cockroach. (h) One of the maxillary palps of various insects. (i) Any slender fleshy process on the back of an insect-larva; especially, a tubular process on the back of certain lepidopterous larvæ, near the head, or at the other end, from which a slender thread or ill-smelling scent-organ can be thrust for the purpose, it is supposed, of repelling ichneumons and other enemies. See osmeterium. (j) One of the soft horns of various mollusks, as snails. (k) The calcar or siphon of a rotifer. (l) In Actinozoa, one of the soft hollow processes of the body-wall communicating with the body-cavity, set in circular form around the mouth, in one or several series, as the fleshy lobes of a sea-anemone. (m) In Hydrozoa, some tentaculiform part, process, or appendage. The tentacles of the Portuguese man-of-war are several feet long. (n) In Protozoa, a pseudopod, or prolongation of the body, especially when slender, stiffish, and more or less permanent, as one of the rays of a sun-animalcule or of an acinetiform infusorian. See Tentaculifera.

2. In bot., a kind of sensitive hair or filament, such as the glandular hairs of Drosera.

A tentacle consists of a thin straight hair-like pedicel, carrying a gland on the summit.
Darwin, Insectiv. Plants, p. 5.

3. Figuratively, anything resembling a tentacle; a feeler.—Auditory tentacle, a tentaculicyst.—Branchial, nuchal, ocular, etc., tentacle. See the adjectives.

tentacled (ten'ta-kld), a. [< tentacle + -ed[2].] Having a tentacle or tentacles. Amer. Jour. Psychol., II. 528.

tentacle-sheath (ten'ta-kl-shēth), n. In conch., the tentacular sheath.

tentacula[1] (ten-tak'ū-lä), n.; pl. tentaculæ (-lē). [NL.: see tentacle.] Same as tentacle.

tentacula[2], n. Plural of tentaculum.

tentacular (ten-tak'ū-lär), a. [= F. tentaculaire = Sp. tentacular; < NL. tentaculum, a tentacle, + -ar[3].] Of or pertaining to a tentacle, in any sense; of the nature, structure, function, or appearance of a tentacle; adapted or used as a tactile organ; tentaculiform: as, tentacular character, movements, or formation.

At the base of the tentacular circle.
W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 551.

Tentacular branch, one of the branches of a tentacle in some Hydrozoa.—Tentacular canal, in crinoids, the central or common canal, which branches into the tentacles and places their cavities in communication with the common cavity, and so with one another.—Tentacular person, a tentacle-like or filamentous part of a compound organism, as a hydroid polyp, provided with an urticating-organ; a nectocalyx.—Tentacular sheath, in conch., a structure which sheathes the bases of the tentacles of various mollusks.

End of a Tentacular Branch of Athorybia rosacea, a siphonophorous hydrozoan. e, the involucrum investing the sacculus, the end of which is straight with the lateral processes curling around it.

Tentaculata (ten-tak-ū-lā'-tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tentaculatus: see tentaculate.] 1. In some systems, a branch or prime division of echinoderms: contrasted with Ambulacrata, and divided into three classes, Crinoidea, Cystoidea, and Blastoidea.—2. A division of ctenophorans, including comb-jellies with two long tentacles. See cuts under Saccatæ.

tentaculate (ten-tak'ū-lāt), a. [< NL. tentaculatus, < tentaculum, tentacle: see tentacle.] 1. Having a tentacle or tentacles; tentaculated; tentaculiferous.—2. Tentaculiform; tentacular: a less careful usage: as, tentaculate processes.—3. Of or pertaining to the Tentaculata: as, crinoids are tentaculate echinoderms.

tentaculated (ten-tak'ū-lā-ted), a. [< tentaculate + -ed[2].] Same as tentaculate.

Tentaculibranchiata (ten-tak″ū-li-brang-ki-ā'tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of * tentaculibranchiatus: see tentaculibranchiate.] The Bryozoa or Polyzoa considered as a class of the branch Lipocephala of the phylum Mollusca. E. R. Lankester.

tentaculibranchiate (ten-tak″ū-li-brang'ki-āt), a. [< NL. * tentaculibranchiatus, < tentaculum, tentacle, + branchiæ, gills.] Of or pertaining to the Tentaculibranchiata.

tentaculicyst (ten-tak'ū-li-sist), n. [< NL. tentaculum, tentacle, + Gr. κύστις, bladder: see cyst.] One of the vesicular or cystic tentacles of a hydrozoan; a marginal body representing a reduced and modified tentacle, whose axis is a hollow endodermal process that distinguishes it from the other kinds of marginal bodies, which are wholly of ectodermal origin, as ocellicysts and otocysts. Also tentaculocyst. See lithocyst, and cut under Steganophthalmata.

tentaculicystic (ten-tak″ū-li-sis'tik), a. [< tentaculicyst + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a tentaculicyst, or having its characters.

Tentaculifera (ten-tak-ū-lif'e-rä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tentaculifer: see tentaculiferous.] 1. One of three divisions of infusorians, containing the acinetiform animalcules, as distinguished from the flagellate and the ciliate; a class or order of Infusoria, characterized by the tentaculiform and usually suctorial nature of their processes, and divided into Suctoria and Actinaria. These animalcules bear neither flagella nor cilia in the adult state, but take their food and move about by means of tentacles developed from the cuticular surface or from the internal protoplasm. These tentacles may be simply adhesive, or tubular and expanded at the end into a cup-like sucking-disk. A nucleus and one or more contractile vacuoles are usually conspicuous; but trichocysts are seldom if ever present. The creatures inhabit fresh or salt water, and multiply by transverse or longitudinal fission or by external or internal gemmation. There are 6 families and 15 genera. Sometimes called Polystomata. See cut under Acinetæ.

2. An order of cephalopods, also called Tetrabranchiata: opposed to Acetabulifera. See cut under Tetrabranchiata.—Tentaculifera actinaria, those tentaculiferous animalcules whose tentacles are merely adhesive and not suctorial, including the families Ephelotidæ and Ophryodendridæ. Kent.—Tentaculifera suctoria, those tentaculiferous animalcules whose tentacles are wholly or partially suctorial. Also called Suctoria.

tentaculiferous (ten-tak-ū-lif'e-rus), a. [< NL. tentaculifer, < tentaculum, tentacle, + L. ferre = E. bear[1]: see -ferous.] Bearing, producing, or provided with tentacles; tentaculate. Also tentaculigerous. Specifically—(a) In Infusoria, of or pertaining to the Tentaculifera; acinetiform, as an animalcule. (b) In Mollusca, of or pertaining to the Tentaculifera; not acetabuliferous, as a cephalopod.

tentaculiform (ten-tak'ū-li-fôrm), a. [< NL. tentaculum, tentacle, + L. forma, form.] Having the form or aspect of a tentacle; tentacular: as, tentaculiform thread-cells. Huxley.

tentaculigerous (ten-tak-ū-lij'e-rus), a. [< NL. tentaculum, tentacle, + L. gerere, carry.] Same as tentaculiferous. Huxley.

tentaculite (ten-tak'ū-līt), n. [< NL. Tentaculites.] A fossil pteropod of the family Tentaculitidæ.—Tentaculite beds, in geol., a subdivision of the Ilfracombe group, of Middle Devonian age, occurring in Devonshire, England: it is so named on account of the abundance of Tentaculites scalaris which it contains.—Tentaculite limestone, in the nomenclature of the New York Survey, a subdivision of the Water-lime group, of Upper Silurian age, abounding in tentaculites.

Tentaculites (ten-tak-ū-lī'tēz), n. [NL., < tentaculum, tentacle: see tentacle.] The typical genus of Tentaculitidæ, having such species as T. gyracanthus.

Tentaculitidæ (ten-tak-ū-lit'i-dē), n. pl. A family of fossils commonly regarded as pteropods (though probably having annelidan affinities), typified by the genus Tentaculites.

tentaculocyst (ten-tak'ū-lō-sist), n. Same as tentaculicyst. Encyc. Brit., XII. 555.

tentaculum (ten-tak'ū-lum), n.; pl. tentacula (-lä). [NL.: see tentacle.] A tentacle of any kind; also, a tactile hair; a vibrissa, as one of the whiskers of a cat.

tentage (ten'tāj), n. [< tent[1] + -age.] Tents collectively; a camp.

Upon the mount the king his tentage fixt.
Drayton, Barons' Wars, ii. 15.

tentation (ten-tā'shon), n. [< ME. tentaciun, < OF. (and F.) tentation = Sp. tentación = Pg. tentação = It. tentazione, < L. tentatio(n-), a trial, proof, attack, temptation, < tentare, pp. tentatus, try, test: see tent[2], tempt, and cf. temption, a doublet of temptation.] 1†. Trial; temptation.

If grace alone sat in the heart, the hopeless devil would forbear his tentations; he knows he hath a friend in our house that will be ready to let him in.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 21.

2. A method of making adjustments of work by trial or experiment. Specifically—(a) A mode of picking locks by releasing the tumblers one after the other from the stud, while the bolt is steadily pressed backward. (b) A method of adjusting compasses on iron ships by shifting the position of boxes of iron chain and magnets experimentally, until the attraction of the hull on the needle is seen to be neutralized. E. H. Knight.

tentative (ten'ta-tiv), a. and n. [< F. tentatif = Sp. Pg. It. tentativo, < L. tentativus, trying, testing, < tentare, pp. tentatus, try, test: see tent[2], tempt.] I. a. Based on or consisting in trial or experiment; experimental; empirical.

Falsehood, though it be but tentative, is neither needed nor approved by the God of truth.
Bp. Hall, Jehu killing the Sons of Ahab.

Neither these nor any other speculations concerning ultimate forms can, however, be regarded as anything more than tentative. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 578.

II. n. An essay; a trial; an experiment.

We can imagine a variety of hypotheses to explain every unexplained phenomenon, and it is only by successive tentatives that we reach any reliable explanation.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. i. § 24.

tentatively (ten'ta-tiv-li), adv. In a tentative manner; by way of trial or experiment.

tented (ten'ted), a. [< tent[1] + -ed[2].] 1. Covered or furnished with tents.

They have used
Their dearest action in the tented field.
Shak., Othello, i. 3. 85.

Till sad Mecistheus and Alastor bore
His honour'd body to the tented shore.
Pope, Iliad, xiii. 532.

2. Of or like a tent.

With Reed-like Lance, and with a blunted Blade,
To Championize vnder a Tented shade.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Vocation.

tenter[1] (ten'tėr), n. [< tent[1] + -er[1].] One who lives in a tent.

The pretty girl of our civilization, who pushes into the canvas home of the tenters. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 801.

tenter[2] (ten'tėr), n. [< ME. tenture, tentowre, < ★OF. tenture, a stretching, hangings, < ML. tentura, a stretcher, tenter, lit. a stretching, spreading (cf. L. tensura, a stretching: see tensure), < tendere, pp. tentus, tensus, stretch: see tend[1], and cf. tent[1], tent[3], and tenture.] 1. A machine or frame used in the manufacture of cloth to stretch out the pieces of stuff, so that they may set or dry evenly and square. Along the upper and lower crosspieces, which can be fixed apart from each other at any required distance, are numerous sharp hooks, called tenter-hooks, on which the selvages of the cloth are hooked.

Sykes, for instance, when his dressing-shop was set on fire and burned to the ground, when the cloth was torn from his tenters and left in shreds on the field, took no steps to discover or punish the miscreants.
Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, ii.

2. Same as tenter-hook.

O how friends' reasons and their freedoms stretch,
When power sets his wide tenters to their sides!
Chapman, Byron's Tragedy, v. 1.

3. One of the little bristles of a fly's foot; a tentacle.

Beset underneath with small bristles or tenters.
Dr. Hooke.

On or upon the tenter or tenters, on the stretch; on the rack; hence, in distress, uneasiness, or suspense.

How, upon the tenters? indeed, if the whole peece were so stretcht, and very well beaten with a yard of reformation, no doubt it would grow to a goodly breadth.
Heywood, Fair Maid of the Exchange (Works, II. 25).

It was gallantry that suited her own maiden loftiness, ever stretched upon the tenters of punctilio.
Goldsmith, Sequel to A Poetical Scale.

tenter[2] (ten'tėr), v. [< tenter[2], n.] I. trans. To hang or stretch on or as on tenters.

Easily we may imagine what acerbity of pain must be endured by our Lord in his tender limbs being stretched forth, racked, and tentered. Barrow, Works, II. xxxii.

We fear he will be bankrupt; he does stretch,
Tenter his credit so; embraces all.
Fletcher, Beggars' Bush, ii. 3.

II. intrans. To support or resist the straining of the tenter; bear tentering.

Woollen cloth will tenter. Bacon.

tenter[3] (ten'tėr), n. [< tent[4], v., + -er[1].] A tender; one who tends or has the care or oversight of something: as, a cattle-tenter; specifically, a person in a factory who tends or watches machinery; often, also, an overseer or foreman in a factory.—Drawing tenter, in cotton-spinning, an operator whose duty it is to supply full cans in place of the emptied ones, and to mend the slivers when they break.

tenter-bar (ten'tėr-bär), n. In bleaching calico, dyeing, etc., a bar provided with a series of tenter-hooks, and used in a tenter for stretching cloth; also, such a bar used for stretching cloth by hand. It is used by engaging the selvage of the cloth upon the hooks and by pulling upon the bar, stretching the material to the desired extent. See tenter[2], 1.

tenter-ground (ten'tėr-ground), n. A ground or space for the erection and maintaining of tenters.

I entered Kendal almost in the dark, and could distinguish only a shadow of the castle on a hill, and tenter-grounds spread far and wide round the town.
Gray, To Dr. Wharton, Oct. 18, 1769.

tenter-hook (ten'tėr-hůk), n. [Early mod. E. tenter-hoke; < tenter[2] + hook.] 1. A hook for stretching cloth on a tenter.

Any Hurts whatsoever, received either by Sword, Cane, or Gun Shot, Knife, Saw, or Hatchet, Hammer, Nail, or Tenter hook, Fire, Blast, or Gunpowder, etc.
Quoted in Ashton's Reign of Queen Anne, II. 106.

2. Figuratively, anything that painfully strains, racks, or tortures.

Parasites are his [the prodigal's] tenter-hooks, and they stretch him till he bursts. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 496.

Difficulties which stretched his fine genius on the tenter-hooks. I. D'Israeli, Curios. of Lit., II. 379.

3. In her., a bearing representing an iron hook with the straight bar pointed at one end, and projecting beyond the bent or angled part at the other, so that it can be driven in by blows of a hammer.—On tenter-hooks. Same as on the tenters (which see, under tenter[2]).

I know Dolly 's on tenter-hooks now.
Whyte Melville, White Rose, II. xxviii.

tentering-machine (ten'tėr-ing-ma-shēn″), n. In weaving, a machine for stretching fabrics, consisting of a combination of rollers, which may be driven at different speeds, with devices for feeding and delivery.

tent-fly (tent'flī), n. A piece of canvas stretched across the ridge-pole of a tent, and secured to the ground by ropes along its lower edges.

tent-guy (tent'gī), n. A rope, additional to the usual tent-ropes, for the better securing of a tent in a storm. A guy usually passes from the top of each upright to the ground at some distance in front and rear.

tenth (tenth), a. and n. [< ME. tenthe, teonthe, tende, beside tethe, tithe, E. tithe, the form with n being due to a mixture with the cognate Icel. tiundi (see teind), and to conformity with ten, < AS. teótha = OS. tehando = OFries. tegotha, tegetha, tegatha, tianda, tienda = D. tiende = MLG. teinde = OHG. zehanto, MHG. zehente (zende), G. zehnte = Icel. tiundi = Sw. tionde = Dan. tiende = Goth. taihunda, tenth; as ten + -th[2]. Cf. tithe.] I. a. 1. Last in order of a series of ten; preceded by nine of the same kind; next in order after that which is ninth: an ordinal numeral.—2. Being one of ten equal portions or sections.—Tenth nerve, in anat., the pneumogastric nerve, as that one of the cranial nerves which comes between the ninth (glossopharyngeal) and the eleventh (spinal accessory) in that enumeration which counts twelve of these structures.

II. n. 1. One of ten equal parts into which anything may be divided; a tithe.—2. In early Eng. law, a tithe of the rents of the year, or of movables, or both, granted or levied by way of tax. When a tenth was the rate fixed for towns and demesnes, that for the counties exclusive of towns and demesnes was usually a fifteenth.

3. Eccles., the tenth part of the annual profit of every living in England, formerly paid to the Pope, but by statute transferred to the crown, and afterward made a part of the fund called Queen Anne's bounty.—4. In music: (a) The interval, whether melodic or harmonic, between any tone and a tone one octave and two degrees distant from it; also, a tone distant by such an interval from a given tone; a compound third. (b) An organ-stop giving tones a tenth above the normal pitch of the digitals used; a decima, or double tierce.

tenthdeal†, adv. [ME. tenthedel; < tenth + deal[1]. Cf. halfendeal.] By as much as a tenth part.

I ne wot in this world what wise i migt
Quite the [thee] tenthe del in al mi lif time.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 4715.

tenthly (tenth'li), adv. [< tenth + -ly[2].] In the tenth place.

tenthredinid (ten-thred'i-nid), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the family Tenthredinidæ.

II. n. A member of the family Tenthredinidæ; a saw-fly.

Tenthredinidæ (ten-thrē-din'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1819), < Tenthredo (stem taken as Tenthredin-*, but prop. Tenthredon-) + -idæ.] An important family of hymenopterous insects, including the forms ordinarily known as saw-flies, and coextensive with the series Phyllophaga. The adults are distinguished by the two-jointed trochanters, the connate abdomen, two apical spurs to the front tibiæ, and a pair of saws at the end of the abdomen of the female. The larvæ often resemble lepidopterous larvæ. They have six true legs, and often from twelve to sixteen prolegs, and are rarely covered with a white waxy secretion. Most species are leaf-feeders, issuing from eggs laid in slits cut in leaves by the female saws. A few forms, however, are twig-borers, or inhabit the stems of cereals or other grasses. They pupate in tough parchment-like silken cocoons. About 700 species are known in Europe, and about 500 in North America. Many are pests to horticulture and agriculture, as the wheat-saw-fly (Cephus pygmæus), the rose-sawfly (Monostegia rosæ), the osier-willow saw-fly (Nematus ventralis), and the imported currant-worm (Nematus ventricosus). See cuts under Hylotoma, Lyda, Securifera, and rose-sawfly.

Tenthredo (ten-thrē'dō), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1748), < Gr. τενθρηδών (-όνος), a kind of wasp. Cf. drone[2].] A genus of saw-flies, typical of the family Tenthredinidæ, at first coextensive with the family, but now restricted to certain forms with long setaceous antennæ, in which the third joint is longer than the fourth, and the lanceolate cell of the fore wings has a straight cross-nervure. They are the largest of the saw-flies next to the Cimbicinæ.

tenticle† (ten'ti-kl), n. [< ML. tenticula*, dim. of tenta, a tent: see tent[1].] A little tent.

They were the tenticles or rather cabins and couches of their soldiers. Patten, Exped. to Scotland (1548). (Davies.) tentif†, a. Same as tentive.

tentifly†, adv. See tentively.

tentiform (ten'ti-fôrm), a. Shaped like a tent; in entom., noting the mines of certain tineid larvæ, in which one or the other surface of the infested leaf is raised in a tent-like form.

tentiginous† (ten-tij'i-nus), a. [< L. tentigo (-gin-), a tension, lust (< tendere, stretch: see tend[1], tent[3]), + -ous.] 1. Excited to lust.

Were you tentiginous, ha? . . .
Did her silk's rustling move you?
B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, ii. 1.

2. Producing lasciviousness; lascivious.

Nothing affects the head so much as a tentiginous humour, repelled and elated to the upper region, found by daily practice to run frequently up into madness.
Swift, Mechanical Operations of the Spirit, ii.

tenting (ten'ting), a. [< tent[1] + -ing[2].] Having the form of a tent. [Rare and erroneous.]

Coverlids gold-tinted like the peach . . .
Fell sleek about him in a thousand folds,
Not hiding up an Apollonian curve
Of neck and shoulder, nor the tenting swerve
Of knee from knee, nor ankles pointing light;
But rather giving them to the filled sight Officiously. Keats, Endymion, ii.

tentive† (ten'tiv), a. [< ME. tentif, tentyf, by apheresis from attentif, attentive: see attentive. Cf. tent[4]. Cf. also tenty, a later form of tentive.] Attentive.

We schulen do so tentyf besynes fro day to night that . . . sche shal be hool and sound.
Chaucer, Tale of Melibeus (Harl. MS.).

tentively† (ten'tiv-li), adv. [< ME. tentifly; < tentive + -ly[2].] Attentively; carefully.

gif ge tentifly take kepe & trewe be to-gadere,
I wol winne our warisun, for i wot where thei are.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 2258.

Tentifly she kept hir fader dere.
Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, l. 278.

tentless (tent'les), a. [< tent[4] + -less.] Inattentive; heedless. [Scotch.]

I'll wander on, with tentless heed
How never-halting moments speed,
Till fate shall snap the brittle thread.
Burns, To James Smith.

tent-maker (tent'mā″kėr), n. One who makes tents.

By their occupation they were tentmakers. Acts xviii. 3.

★tentorial (ten-tō'ri-al), a. [< tentorium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the tentorium.—Tentorial angle, an angle formed by the intersection of the basicranial axis with the plane of the tentorium, the apex being directed upward.

tentorium (ten-tō′ri-um), n.; pl. tentoria (-ä). [NL., < L. tentorium, a tent, < tendere, stretch: see tend[1]. Cf. tent[1].] 1. A partition, composed of a strong sheet of the dura mater, stretched across the back part of the cranial cavity in man, between the cerebrum and the cerebellum. A tentorium sometimes ossifies, or includes a shelf of bone, the bony tentorium, as in the cat family. More fully called tentorium cerebelli.

2. In zoöl. and anat., the endocranium. Huxley. —3. Same as tenture.—Sinus tentorii. See sinus.

tentory† (ten′tō-ri), n.; pl. tentories (-riz). [< OF. tentorie, < L. tentorium, a tent: see tentorium.] An awning; a tent.

The women . . . who are said to weave hangings and curtains for the grove were no other than makers of tentories to spread from tree to tree. Evelyn, Sylva, iv. § 8.

tent-peg (tent′peg), n. Same as tent-pin.

tent-pegging (tent′peg″ing), n. An equestrian game or exercise common among British soldiers in India, in which the competitors, riding at full gallop, try to strike and carry off on the point of a lance a tent-peg which has been firmly fixed in the ground.

As a last wind-up there was a little tent-pegging, but, as my husband and Lieutenant Carrol were the only ones who could do anything, it was soon over. E. Sartorius, In the Soudan, p. 196.

tent-pin (tent′pin), n. A stout peg driven into the ground to fasten one of the ropes of a tent to. It is usually of wood, with a notch or nick to confine the bight of the rope, but sometimes of iron, with a hook or ring to receive the rope.

While he [Sisera] was awearied and asleep, Jael drove the tent-pin through his head and fastened it to the ground. The Century, XXXVIII. 868.

tent-pole (tent′pōl), n. One of the poles used in pitching a tent. There are usually two uprights, one at the front and one at the rear, connected at the top by a horizontal ridge-pole. In the Sibley and the bell tent there is but one, a central pole or post. The tent-poles of an Indian tepee are several, stacked in a circle, upon which skins are stretched as on a frame.

tent-rope (tent′rōp), n. One of the several ropes or cords by which a tent is secured to the tent-pins and thus to the ground. These ropes are attached to the tent usually at intervals corresponding to a breadth of the canvas.

tent-stitch (tent′stich), n. A stitch used in worsted-work and embroidery, single and not crossed, the stitches lying side by side in a diagonal direction. Also called petit point.

About a month ago Tent and Turkey-stitch seemed at a stand; my wife knew not what new work to introduce. Johnson, The Idler, No. 13.

Black leather cushions, embroidered in red and blue tent-stitch. S. Judd, Margaret, ii. 11.

tent-tree (tent′trē), n. A tall species of screw-pine, Pandanus Forsteri, of Lord Howe's Island, New South Wales.

tenture (ten′tūr), n. [< F. tenture, hangings: see tenter[2] and tent[1].] Hangings or decoration for a wall, especially paper-hangings. Also tentorium.

tent-wine (tent′wīn), n. Same as tent[5].

tentwise (tent′wīz), adv. In the form of a tent.

tent-work (tent′wėrk), n. Work produced by embroidering with tent-stitch.

Our great grandmothers distinguished themselves by truly substantial tent-work chairs and carpets; by needlework pictures of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. Miss Edgeworth, Practical Education, xx.

tentwort (tent′wėrt), n. A fern, Asplenium Ruta-muraria. Also called wall-rue.

tenty (ten′ti), a. [Also tentie; a reduced form of tentive.] Attentive; cautious; careful. [Scotch.]

Jean slips in twa with tentie e'e. Burns, Halloween.

tenuate (ten′ū-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. tenuated, ppr. tenuating. [< L. tenuatus, pp. of tenuare, make thin or slender, < tenuis, thin: see tenuous.] To make thin. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

tenues, n. Plural of tenuis.

tenuifolious (ten″ū-i-fō′li-us), a. [< L. tenuis, thin, + folium, leaf.] In bot., having slender or narrow leaves.

tenuious† (te-nū′i-us), a. [< L. tenuis, thin: see tenuous.] Same as tenuous.

The thing I speak of is as easie to be apprehended as how infection should pass in certain tenuious streams through the air from one house to another. Glanville, Essays, vi.

A tenuious emanation or continued effluvium. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 4.

tenuiroster (ten″ū-i-ros′tėr), n. [< NL. tenuirostris: see Tenuirostres.] A slender-billed bird, as a member of the Tenuirostres.

tenuirostral (ten″ū-i-ros′tral), a. [< tenuiroster + -al.] Slender-billed, as a bird: formerly specifying the Tenuirostres, now simply descriptive. See cuts under bill and Promerops.

Tenuirostres (ten″ū-i-ros′trēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of tenuirostris, slender-billed, < L. tenuis, thin, + rostrum, bill, beak.] 1†. A very extensive and unnatural assemblage of chiefly passerine or insessorial birds in which the beak is slender, as creepers, nuthatches, honey-eaters, sun-birds, humming-birds, hoopoes, and many others having little real affinity: correlated with Dentirostres, Conirostres, etc., in some of the older systems, as that of Cuvier. By Blyth (1849) the term was restricted to the swifts and humming-birds.—2. In ornith., in Sclater's system of 1880, a group of laminiplantar oscine Passeres, nearly conterminous with Sundevall's Cinnyrimorphæ.

tenuis (ten′ū-is), n.; pl. tenues (-ēz). [NL., < L. tenuis, thin, fine, close: see tenuous.] In gram., one of the three surd mutes of the Greek alphabet, κ, π, τ, in relation to their respective middle letters, or medials (that is, sonant mutes), γ, β, δ, or their aspirates, χ, φ, θ. These terms are sometimes also applied to the corresponding articulate elements in other languages, as k, p, t.

tenuity (te-nū′i-ti), n. [Early mod. E. tenuitie; < OF. tenuite, F. ténuité = Sp. tenuidad = Pg. tenuidade = It. tenuità, < L. tenuita(t-)s, thinness, slenderness, fineness, smallness, < tenuis, thin: see tenuous.] 1. The state of being tenuous or thin; want of substantial thickness or depth; fineness; thinness, as applied to a broad substance, or slenderness, as applied to one that is long.

When I sat down, my intent was to write a good book, and, as far as the tenuity of my understanding would hold out, a wise, ay, and a discreet. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iii., Author's Pref.

He [the bull-dog] is not well shaped; for there is not the quick transition from the thickness of the fore-part, to the tenuity—the thin part—behind, which a bull-dog ought to have. Johnson, in Boswell, an. 1777.

2. Rarity; rareness; thinness, as of a fluid. —3†. Poverty; indigence.

The tenuity and contempt of clergymen will soon let them see what a poor carcase they are, when parted from the influence of that supremacy. Eikon Basilike.

4. Simplicity or plainness; a quality of style opposed to opulence or grandeur.

tenuous (ten′ū-us), a. [Formerly also tenuious, q. v.; = F. ténu = Sp. tenue, tenuo = Pg. It. tenue, < L. tenuis, thin, slender, slim, fine, narrow, close, = E. thin: see thin[1].] 1. Thin; small; minute.—2. Rare; rarefied; fine; subtile.

In the Sophist, that bewildering maze of tenuous abstractions, a certain mysterious Eleatic stranger conducts the argument to its fitting and convincing close. Jour. Spec. Phil., XIX. 42.

tenuousness (ten′ū-us-nes), n. Tenuous or attenuated character or quality; slenderness; ★thinness; sparseness; rarity.

tenure (ten′ūr), n. [< ME. tenure*, tennure, < OF. tenure, teneure, F. tenure (ML. tenura), a tenure, or estate in land, < L. tenere, hold: see tenant[1].] 1. The nature of the right or title by which property, especially real property, is held; also, the property so held. Land-tenure is, in the main, either feudal or allodial. According to the latter tenure, the whole right and title to the land rests with the owner, subject only to the right of the state, and this is the principle of United States law; according to the former, the person possessing the land holds it from a superior, and this is the principle of English law. According to the theory in England, all land is held of the crown, either mediately or immediately. The ownership of land is therefore never unlimited as to extent, for he who is the owner of land in fee, which is the largest estate that a man can have in land, is not absolute owner; he owes services in respect of his fee (or fief), and the seigniory of the lord always subsists. All land in the hands of any layman is held of some lord, to whom the holder or tenant owes some service; but in the case of church lands, although they are held by tenure, no temporal services are due, but the lord of whom these lands are held must be considered the owner, although the beneficial ownership can never revert to the lord. All the species of ancient tenures may be reduced to four, three of which still subsist: (1) tenure by knight-service, which was the most honorable (now abolished); (2) tenure in free socage, or by a certain and determinate service, which is either free and honorable or villein and base; (3) tenure by copy of court-roll, or copyhold tenure; (4) tenure in ancient demesne. There was also tenure in frankalmoin, or by free alms. (See frankalmoin.) The tenure in free and common socage has absorbed most of the others. (See estate, tenant[1], copyhold, socage, villeinage.) In Scots law the equivalent technical term is holding.

And had not I ben, the comens wolde have brennyd his plase and all his tennuryes, wher thorough it coste me of my nowne propr godes at that tyme more than vj. merks in mate and drynke. Paston Letters, I. 133.

2. The consideration or service which the occupier of land pays to his lord or superior for the use of his land, or the condition on which he holds it.

To ride in the lord's train, to go at the lord's bidding wherever he might will, to keep "head-ward" over the manor at nightfall, or horse-ward over its common field, to hedge and ditch about the demesne, or to help in the chase and make the "deer-hedge," were tenures by which the villagers held their lands, as well as by labor on the lord's land one day a week throughout the year, and a month's toil in harvest-time. J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 317.

We served not in Cæsar's armies; we took not Cæsar's pay; we held no lands by the tenure of guarding Cæsar's frontiers. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 117.

3. Holding, or manner of holding, in general; the terms or conditions on which, or the period during which, anything is held.

It is most absurd and ridiculous for any mortal man to look for a perpetual tenure of happiness in his life. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 94.

4. Quality with respect to proportion of ingredients.

The ores treated in this [Castilian] furnace ought never to contain more than 30 per cent. of metal, and, when richer, must be reduced to about this tenure by the addition of slags and other fluxes. Ure, Dict., III. 62.

Barons by tenure. See baron, 1.—Base tenure. See copyhold, 1.—Cottier tenure. See cotter[1].—Military tenure. See military.—Privity of tenure. See privity.—Tenure by divine service. See divine.—Tenure in aumone. See aumone.—Tenure of Office Act. (a) An act of the United States Congress, May 15th, 1820 (3 Stat. 582), prescribing that large classes of public officers should be appointed for the limited term of four years and removable at pleasure. (b) An act of 1867 (14 Stat. 430; Rev. Stat. § 1767 et seq.), providing that persons appointed to civil offices by the President, and confirmed by the Senate, excepting members of the cabinet, shall hold such offices until their successors are qualified, subject to suspension by the President, during the recess of the Senate, for misconduct; and that they can be removed only with the consent of the Senate.

tenure-horn (ten′ūr-hôrn), n. A horn by the possession or exhibition of which certain estates were held. Compare tenure-sword. The "Bruce horn" of Savernake Forest, Wiltshire, and the "Tutbury horn" of Tutbury in Staffordshire, England, have been exhibited at South Kensington.

tenure-sword (ten′ūr-sōrd), n. A sword by the exhibition of which at certain times certain lands were held. In most cases the sword so exhibited was sacredly preserved in the family holding the estate. The weapons seem generally to have been falchions, or short curved swords. J. P. Earwaker.

tenury†, n. Same as tenure.

tenuto (te-nō′tō), a. [It., pp. of tenere, hold, < L. tenere, hold: see tenant[1].] In music, held; sustained; given full value: used of tones or chords occurring in contrast to staccato tones or chords. It is nearly the same in effect as legato. Abbreviated ten.—Tenuto mark, in musical notation, a horizontal stroke over a note or chord, to indicate that it is to be held its full time: thus, $\bar{e}$.

tenzon (ten′zon), n. Same as tenson.

teocalli (te-ō-kal′i), n. [= Sp. teocali, teucali, < Nahuatl teocalli, a temple, lit. 'house of a god,' < teotl, a god, + calli, a house.] A structure made of earth and stone or brick, used as a temple or place of worship by the Mexicans. They were generally solid four-sided truncated pyramids, built terrace-wise, with the temple proper on the platform at the summit. Many teocallis still remain in a more or less perfect state, as the so-called Pyramid of Cholula. Also teopan.

teonet, v. t. A Middle English form of teen[1].

teonoma (tē-on′ō-mä), n. [An anagram of Neotoma, q. v.] 1. The large bushy-tailed rat of the Rocky Mountains, Neotoma cinerea, the pack-rat.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of such rats, separated from Neotoma. J. E. Gray.

teopan (tē′ō-pan), n. Same as teocalli.

teosinte (te-ō-sin′te), n. [Nahuatl.] A grass, a variety of Euchlæna Mexicana, native in Mexico and Central America, widely introduced into cultivation. It is allied to the Indian corn, having the male flowers in a tassel at the top, the seed, however, borne not on a cob, but on slender stems from the joints, inclosed in a loose husk. It is an annual, reaching the height of 12 feet, suitable for forage, and perhaps the most prolific of forage-plants, sending up sometimes sixty or eighty shoots, and springing up again when cut. It endures drought fairly well, though preferring humid soil. Its success in the southern United States is hindered by its not ripening its seed; it is found to do so, however, in some subtropical localities. Also called Guatemala grass.

tepal (tep′al), n. [< petal, transposed for distinction, prob. in imitation of sepal.] In bot., an individual segment of a perianth, whether sepal or petal. [Rare.]

tepee (tē′pē), n. [Also teepee, tipi; Dakota tipi.] An Indian tent.

tepefaction (tep-ē-fak′shon), n. [< L. as if tepefactio(n-)*, < tepefacere, make lukewarm: see tepefy.] The act or operation of making tepid, or moderately warm. Imp. Dict.

tepefy (tep'ē-fī), v.; pret. and pp. tepefied, ppr. tepefying. [< L. tepefacere, make lukewarm, < tepere, be lukewarm (see tepid), + facere, make.]

I. trans. To make tepid, or moderately warm.

II. intrans. To become moderately warm.

tepetate (tā-pā-tā'tā), n. [Nahuatl tepetl, mountain, + tlatatl, mud.] A material found over the greater portion of the surface of Mexico, and supposed to be consolidated volcanic mud. It somewhat resembles a sun-baked clay. It is also found less extensively in Central and South America.

tephramancy (tef'ra-man-si), n. Same as tephromancy.

tephrite (tef'rīt), n. [< L. tephritis, < Gr. τεφρῖτις*, an ash-colored stone, < τεφρός, ash-colored, < τέφρα, ashes.] In petrog., a dark and often aphanitic igneous rock, of the basaltic group, consisting chiefly of pyroxene, lime-soda feldspar, nephelin or leucite, and magnetite or ilmenite. The texture is microlitic, with or without prominent crystals or a glassy base. Tephrite differs from common basalt in containing both plagioclase and nephelin or leucite, without olivin, and from basanite in freedom from olivin. It is comparable to basalt in occurrence and habit. The kind rich in nephelin is called nephelin-tephrite and that with leucite leucite-tephrite.

tephritic (tef-rit'ik), a. [< tephrite + -ic.] Of the nature of tephrite; pertaining to tephrite.

tephritoid (tef'ri-toid), n. [< tephrite + -oid.] A variety of tephrite. In this nephelin is wanting, but its base is made up of a material rich in soda, and gelatinizing in acid, by which the nephelin is to a certain extent replaced.

Tephrodornis (tef-rō-dôr'nis), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1831), < Gr. τεφρώδης, ashy (< τέφρα, ashes), + ὄρνις, a bird.] An extensive genus of Indian shrike-like birds, now restricted to 6 species, of which the best-known is the so-called Keroula shrike of Pondicherry, T. pondicerianus.

tephroite (tef'rō-īt), n. [Irreg. < Gr. τεφρός, ash-gray, + -ite[2]. Cf. tephrite.] A silicate of manganese of an ash-gray or reddish color, commonly occurring in cleavable masses: found in New Jersey, also in Sweden. It belongs to the chrysolite group.

tephromancy (tef'rō-man-si), n. [Also tephramancy; < F. téphromancie, < NL. tephromantia, < Gr. τέφρα, ashes, + μαντεία, divination.] Augury depending on the inspection of the ashes of a sacrifice.

Tephrosia (tef-rō'si-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. τεφρός, ash-colored, < τέφρα, ashes.] A name given by Persoon in 1807 to Cracca, a genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Galegeæ. It is characterized by racemose flowers with blunt anthers, the banner-stamen free at the base, but early united with the other stamens at the middle, and the style somewhat rigid, incurved, and usually bearded at the tip; and b, a compressed linear or rarely ovate pod with two thin valves, nerve-like sutures, and numerous seeds sometimes enlarged by a small strophiole. There are about 120 species, widely scattered through warm regions and especially numerous in Australia. A few are found in North America, 16 occurring within the United States south of Delaware, one of which, Cracca Virginiana, extends northward as far as Maine and Minnesota. They are herbs or shrubs, with odd-pinnate leaves of many leaflets, rarely reduced to three or even to one, often closely hoary with silken hairs, and remarkable, except in a few Australian species, for their peculiar veins, not netted or branching, but extending parallel to each other obliquely from the midrib. The red, purple, or white flowers are conspicuously papilionaceous, with the petals borne on claws, the banner roundish and externally silky, the keel incurved; they form racemes which are often leafy at the base and are terminal, opposite the leaves, or grouped in the upper axils. C. Virginiana is locally known as wild sweet-pea from its flowers, and as devil's-shoestrings and catgut from its long, slender, and very tough roots; book-names are hoary pea and goat's rue. Several species yield a dye, as C. tinctoria, used for indigo at Mysore, and C. Apollinea (for which see Egyptian indigo, under indigo). C. purpurea in India and C. toxicaria in Surinam are used medicinally; the latter, under the name Surinam poison, is used in the West Indies and elsewhere to stupefy fish.

Hoary Pea (Cracca Virginiana). a, the fruits.

tepid (tep'id), a. [= OF. tiede = It. tepido, tiepido, < L. tepidus, lukewarm, tepid (cf. tepor, heat, = Skt. tapas, heat), < tepere, be lukewarm, = Skt. tap, be warm.] Moderately warm; lukewarm.

> The naked negro, panting at the Line, . . .
> Basks in the glare, or stems the tepid wave.
> Goldsmith, Traveller, l. 71.

tepidarium (tep-i-dā'ri-um), n.; pl. tepidaria (-ạ). [L., a tepid bath, or the room set apart for it, < tepidus, lukewarm, tepid: see tepid.] In the ancient Roman baths, an apartment heated to a certain temperature to prepare the body for the great heat of the hot and vapor baths, or to serve as a palliative to the cold of the frigidarium; also, the boiler in which the water was heated for the hot bath.

tepidity (tē-pid'i-ti), n. [< F. tépidité = Pr. tepiditat = It. tiepidità, < L. as if tepidita(t-)s*, lukewarmness, < tepidus, lukewarm, tepid: see tepid.] Lukewarmness.

> They upbraided the tepidity and infidel baseness of the Jewish nation. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 49.

tepidly (tep'id-li), adv. In a tepid manner; lukewarmly.

tepidness (tep'id-nes), n. Tepidity.

tepor (tep'ọr), n. [= It. tepore, < L. tepor, lukewarmness, < tepere, be lukewarm: see tepid.] Gentle heat; moderate warmth.

> The small pox, mortal during such a season, grew more favorable by the tepor and moisture in April. Arbuthnot.

tepoy, n. See teapoy.

tequesquite (tek-es-kē'te), n. [Said to be so called from a Mexican place-name.] In Mexican metal., native carbonate of soda mixed with some sulphate and common salt, which effloresces, after the rainy season, on the surface of the plains in Mexico, and later in the season forms a crust.

> In the two Haciendas of the Company [at Sombrerete], La Purisinia and La Soledad, amalgamation is but little employed. The ores are usually smelted, and in this process great use is made of the tequesquite (carbonate of soda) from La Salada, which is employed as a dissolvent.
> Ward, Mexico, II. 279.

ter (tèr), adv. [L., thrice, < tres (tri-), three: see three.] Thrice: used in music to indicate that a measure or phrase to which it is attached is to be repeated three times in succession.

terage†, n. [ME., appar. < OF. terrage*, land (found only in sense of field-rent), < L. terra, land: see terra.] Country; territory.

> Dyomed dernly dressit to wend
> To the terage of Troy with a tore ost.
> Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 12786.

teramorphous (ter-ạ-môr'fus), a. [Prop. teratomorphous*, < Gr. τέρας (τερατ-), a monster, + μορφή, form.] Of the form or nature of a monstrosity.

terapene†, n. An obsolete form of terrapin.

teraph (ter'af), n.; pl. teraphim (-ạ-fim). [Heb.] A household image reverenced by the ancient Hebrews: in the Bible used only in the plural, and sometimes applied to one image. The teraphim seem to have been either wholly or in part of human form and of small size. They appear to have been reverenced as penates, or household gods, and in some shape or other to have been used as domestic oracles.

terapin†, n. An obsolete spelling of terrapin.

Teras (tē'ras), n. [NL. (Treitschke, 1829), < Gr. τέρας, a monster.] A notable genus of moths, ordinarily placed at the head of the tortricid series. The genus is wide-spread and the species are numerous. T. minuta is common in the United States, and feeds in the larval state on the leaves of the apple. T. caudana is a curious European species in which the fore wings have a falcate outer margin and an excavation on the costal margin. T. contaminana is known as the checkered pebble. Synonymous with Alceris (Huebner).

Teras (Alceris) minuta.
a, larva; b, pupa; c, moth; d, leaf with pupal exuvium. (Cross and lines show natural sizes.)

teratical†, (tē-rat'i-kạl), a. [< teratic*, < Gr. τερατικός, strange, monstrous, < τέρας (τερατ-), a sign, wonder, prodigy, monster, a huge animal, a strange creature.] Marvelous; prodigious; incredible.

> Herodotus, possibly delighting in teratical stories, might tell what he never heard.
> W. Wollaston, Religion of Nature, iii. 16.

teratogenic (ter″ạ-tō-jen'ik), a. [< teratogen-y + -ic.] Producing monsters; of or pertaining to teratogeny.

teratogeny (ter-ạ-toj'e-ni), n. [< Gr. τέρας (τερατ-), a monster, + γεννᾶν, produce.] In pathol., the production of monsters.

teratoid (ter'ạ-toid), a. [< Gr. τέρας (τερατ-), a monster, + εἶδος, form.] Resembling a monster.—Teratoid tumor. Same as teratoma.

teratolite (ter'ạ-tō-līt), n. [< Gr. τέρας (τερατ-), a prodigy, + λίθος, stone.] A kind of clay or fine-grained silicate of alumina from the coal-formation of Planitz in Saxony, formerly supposed to possess valuable medicinal properties, whence it had its ancient name of terra miraculosa Saxoniæ. Also called lithomarge. Sometimes erroneously spelled terratolite, as if from Latin terra, earth.

teratologic (ter″ạ-tō-loj'ik), a. [< teratolog-y + -ic.] Same as teratological.

teratological (ter″ạ-tō-loj'i-kạl), a. [< teratologic + -al.] Of or pertaining to teratology.

teratologist (ter-ạ-tol'ō-jist), n. [< teratolog-y + -ist.] 1. One who deals in marvels; a marvel-monger. Imp. Dict.—2. One versed in teratology.

teratology (ter-ạ-tol'ō-ji), n. [= F. tératologie, < NL. teratologia, < Gr. τερατολογία, a telling of marvels or prodigies, < τέρας (τερατ-), a sign, marvel, prodigy, monster, + -λογία, < λέγειν, say, tell (see -ology).] 1. Narration of what is marvelous or prodigious; exaggeration in description.

> Teratology is when bold Writers, fond of the sublime, intermix something great and prodigious in every Thing they write, whether there be Foundation for it in Reason or not, and this is what is call'd Bombast. Bailey, 1727.

2. In anat., zoöl., and bot., the science of animal or vegetable monstrosities; that department of biology which treats of malformations, or monstrous or abnormal growths, in the animal or the vegetable kingdom.

teratoma (ter-ạ-tō'mạ), n.; pl. teratomata (-ma-tạ). [NL., < Gr. τέρας (τερατ-), a monster, + -oma.] A complex congenital tumor, often containing very many different tissues, as skin, hair, teeth, connective tissue, cartilage, bone, muscles, and glands: most frequently found at the lower end of the spine, about the head and neck, and in the generative organs.

teratomatous (ter-ạ-tom'ạ-tus), a. [< teratoma(t) + -ous.] Having the character of a teratoma.

terbium (tèr'bi-um), n. [NL., < (Yt)terb(y) in Sweden: see erbium, and cf. yttrium.] In chem., a supposed element of the yttrium class. It has not been obtained in the free state. See ★terbia. Its atomic weight is 159.2, assuming that it is a single element, and that its oxid has the constitution Tr_2O_3.

terce (tèrs), n. [Early mod. E. also terse; < ME. ters*, terce*, < OF. ters, tiers, m., terce, tierce, f., third (tierce, a third part), < L. tertius = E. third: see third, and cf. tierce.] 1†. A third; a third part.

> Then we were in ix. degrees and a terce, rekenynge owr selues xxx. leagues of the sholes of the ryuer cauled Rio Grande.
> R. Eden, First Books on America (ed. Arber, p. 380).
>
> The 15. we came to Hatorask, in 36. degrees and a terse, at 4. fadom, 3 leagues from shore.
> Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 103.

2. Same as tierce, 3.—3. In Scots law, a right corresponding to dower in English law; a real right whereby a widow who has not accepted any special provision is entitled to a life-rent of one third of the heritage in which her husband died infeft, provided the marriage has endured for a year and a day, or has produced a living child. No widow is entitled to her terce until she is regularly kenned to it. See ken[1], v. t., 5.—4. In the Roman Catholic and Greek churches, and in religious houses, and as a devotional office in the Anglican Church, the office of the third hour: originally and properly said half-way between sunrise and noon. See canonical hours, under canonical.

tercel (tėr'sel), n. [Formerly also tiercel, terselle, tarsel, and by assimilation tassel, tassell; < ME. tercel, tersel, tercelle, terselle, < OF. tercel = Pr. tersol = Sp. terzuelo = It. terzuolo, < ML. tertiolus, a male hawk, lit. '*thirdling,' so called because, in popular notion, of three eggs laid by a hawk, the third was sure to produce a male, of smaller size than the others; dim. of L. tertius, third: see terce, tertian, third.] A male falcon; especially, the male of the peregrine falcon.

> Another tersel egle spak anon.
> Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 449.
> I could not any where come by a goss-hawk, nor tassel of falcon. Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, i. 39.

tercine (tėr'sin), n. [< F. tercine, < L. tertius, third: see terce.] In bot., a supposed third coat of an ovule, really a layer of the primine or secundine, or the secundine itself. Lindley. Gloss.

tere†. A Middle English form of tear[1], tear[2], tar[1].

terebate (ter'ē-bāt), n. [< tereb(ic) + -ate[1].] In chem., a compound of terebic acid and a base.

terebella (ter-ē-bel'ä), n.; pl. terebellæ (-ē). [NL., dim. of L. terebra, a borer, a trepan: see terebra.] 1. In surg., a trepan or trephine. — 2. A marine tubicolous worm of the genus Terebella. — 3. [cap.] [NL. (Gmelin, 1790).] The typical genus of Terebellidæ.

Terebellidæ (ter-ē-bel'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Terebella + -idæ.] A family of tubicolous polychætous annelids.

Terebellum (ter-ē-bel'um), n. [A corruption of Gr. τετράπλευρον, a quadrangle (a name applied to this group by Ptolemy), neut. of τετράπλευρος, four-sided, < τετρα-, four, + πλευρά, side.] A group of four stars, in the form of a quadrilateral, at the root of the tail of Sagittarius.

terebene (ter'ē-bēn), n. [< tereb(inth) + -ene.] A name formerly given to the mixture of inactive camphene, cymene, and dipentene formed by the action of concentrated sulphuric acid on pinene or oil of turpentine.

terebic (tē-reb'ik), a. [< tereb(inth) + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or obtained from turpentine. — Terebic acid, $C_7H_{10}O_4$, a monobasic acid, a product of the action of nitric acid on turpentine-oil. Also called turpentinic, terebilic, and terebinic acid.

terebinth (ter'ē-binth), n. [Formerly also teribinth; < ME. terebinth*, terebynt, < OF. terebinthe, F. térébinthe = Pr. terebinte = Sp. It. terebinto = Pg. terebintho, < L. terebinthus, ML. also terebintus = Gr. τερέβινθος, τέρβινθος, earlier τέρμινθος, also τρέμβος, τρίμβος, the terebinth, also its resin, turpentine. Cf. turpentine, from the same source.] 1. The turpentine-tree, Pistacia Terebinthus, native in the lands about the Mediterranean, the source of Chian turpentine. It is a tree of moderate size, with pinnate leaves and panicles of inconspicuous flowers. It is common in the hot and dry southern and eastern parts of Palestine, there taking the place of the oak. It generally stands isolated, seldom in clumps, never in forests, and is an object of veneration. Also named Algerine or Barbary mastic-tree.

2†. Turpentine. — Oil of terebinth, oil of turpentine.

terebinthen†, a. [ME. terebynten; < terebinth + -en[2].] Of terebinth.

> And putte in everie hole a wegge or pynne,
> A birchen here, a terebynten there.
> Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 97.

terebinthina (ter-ē-bin'thi-nä), n. [NL., fem. (sc. resina) of terebinthinus, of the terebinth: see terebinthine.] The officinal name of turpentine.

terebinthinate (ter-ē-bin'thi-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. terebinthinated, ppr. terebinthinating. [< terebinthine + -ate[2].] To impregnate with turpentine. — Terebinthinated collodion, collodion to which some fatty, oily, or waxy ingredient has been added for the purpose of making it flexible. — Terebinthinated ether, an ethereal solution of oil of turpentine. — Terebinthinated fumigation, a vapor-bath of steam charged with turpentine.

terebinthinate (ter-ē-bin'thi-nāt), a. and n. [< terebinthine + -ate[1].] I. a. Terebinthine; impregnated with the qualities of turpentine.

II. n. In med., a preparation of the turpentine of firs.

terebinthine (ter-ē-bin'thin), a. [< L. terebinthinus, < Gr. τερεβίνθινος, of the terebinth, or of turpentine, < τερέβινθος, terebinth, turpentine: see terebinth. Cf. turpentine.] 1. Of or pertaining to the terebinth or turpentine-tree. — 2. Of or pertaining to turpentine; consisting of turpentine, or partaking of its qualities.

terebinthinous (ter-ē-bin'thi-nus), a. [< L. terebinthinus: see terebinthine.] Same as terebinthine, 2.

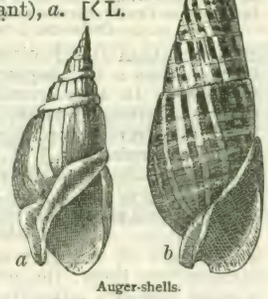
Pimpla conquisitor.



a, side view of abdomen, showing terebra or ovipositor partly extended; b, anterior extremity of terebra and supports, showing method of attachment; c, ventral view of same. 1, sheaths; 2, upper grooved portions of terebra; 3, the two lower filaments or spiculæ.

terebinth-tree (ter'ē-binth-trē), n. Same as terebinth, 1.

terebra (ter'ē-brä), n.; pl. terebræ (-brē). [NL., < L. terebra, a borer, an auger, a trepan, an engine for piercing a wall, < terere, pp. tritus, rub, grind: see trite.] 1. A machine employed by the Romans in sieges to begin a breach in a wall, consisting of a long spear-like beam mounted on an axis, and worked in a groove by machinery. — 2. In entom., the borer or modified ovipositor of various insects, and especially of the terebrant hymenopters. With this organ the insects puncture the places in which they lay their eggs. — 3. [cap.] A genus of marine toxoglossate gastropods, having a long slender tapering spire, typical of the family Terebridæ; the auger-shells. Adanson, 1757.

terebrant (ter'ē-brant), a. [< L. terebran(t-)s, ppr. of terebrare, bore: see terebrate.] Boring with a terebra, as a hymenopterous insect; of or pertaining to the Terebrantia.

Terebrantia (ter-ē-bran'shi-ä), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille, 1817), neut. pl. of L. terebran(t-)s, boring, boring through: see terebrant.] 1.

Auger-shells.

a, Terebra (Bullia) semiplicata. b, Terebra maculata.

In Latreille's system, one of the two prime divisions of the order Hymenoptera, comprising those forms which have the abdomen of the females furnished with an instrument employed as a saw or a borer for depositing their eggs: opposed to Aculeata, in which the abdomen is armed with a sting, and divided into Securifera and Pupivora. Westwood adopted this division, and divided the section into Phytophaga and Entomophaga, the former including the saw-flies (Tenthredinidæ) and horntails (Uroceridæ), and the latter the gall-flies (Cynipidæ), the parasitic Evaniidæ, Ichneumonidæ, Braconidæ, Chalcididæ, and Proctotrypidæ (grouped together under the term Spiculifera), and the rubytails or Chrysididæ, for which the term Tubulifera of MacLeay was adopted.

2. In Crustacea, the boring or burrowing cripeds; the Alcippidæ.

terebrate (ter'ē-brāt), v.; pret. and pp. terebrated, ppr. terebrating. [< L. terebratus, pp. of terebrare, bore, bore through, < terebra, a borer: see terebra. Cf. terrier[3].] I. trans. To bore; perforate. [Rare.]

> The teguments of earthworms . . . we shall find completely adapted to their way of life and motion, being made in the most complete manner possible for terebrating the earth, and creeping.
> Derham, Physico-Theol., iv. 12, note p.

II. intrans. To be a bore; make one tired. [Rare.]

> O for a world where peace and silence reign,
> And blunted dulness terebrates in vain!
> O. W. Holmes, A Modest Request.

terebrate (ter'ē-brāt), a. [< terebra + -ate[1].] Provided with a terebra or borer, as a hymenopterous insect; fashioned into a borer, as an ovipositor.

terebration (ter-ē-brā'shon), n. [< L. terebratio(n-), a boring, < terebrare, bore: see terebrate.] The act of boring or piercing.

> Terebration of trees doth make them prosper better.
> Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 463.

Terebratula (ter-ē-brat'ū-lä), n. [NL. (Lhwyd, 1699), dim. of L. terebratus, pp. of terebrare, bore: see terebrate.] 1. An extensive genus of articulate brachiopods, formerly including all those loosely known as lamp-shells, now restricted as type of the family Terebratulidæ. They are characterized by a circular perforation (whence the name); the loop is very short, simple, and attached by the crura to the hinge-plate. Nearly all are extinct. See cuts under Terebratulidæ and Brachiopoda.

2. [l. c.] Any member of this genus, or a similar brachiopod; a lamp-shell.

Terebratulidæ (ter″ē-bra-tū'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Terebratula + -idæ.] A large family of articulate brachiopods, typified by the genus Terebratula. The brachial appendages are variously folded upon themselves, united to one another by a membrane, and more or less supported by a calcified process; the valves are variable in shape, but always have a prominent beak truncated by a circular perforation, partly completed by a deltidium of one or two pieces, and the shell-substance punctated. All the species have a peduncle passing through the rostral perforation, by which they attach themselves to rocks and other objects on the bottom of the sea. The family is an extensive one; it dates back to the Devonian, and continues to be represented by more living forms than any other family. It is divided into various subfamilies. See also cut under Brachiopoda.

Terebratula australis.

a, adductor muscles; f, cardinal muscles; p, peduncle; t, teeth; v, vent.

terebratuliform (ter-ē-brat'ū-li-fôrm), a. [< NL. Terebratula + L. forma, form.] Resembling or related to the genus Terebratula; shaped like the shell of a terebratuline brachiopod.

terebratuline (ter-ē-brat'ū-lin), a. [< Terebratula + -ine[1].] Pertaining to the Terebratulidæ, or having their characters.

terebratulite (ter-ē-brat'ū-līt), n. [< Terebratula + -ite[2].] A fossil terebratula, or some similar lamp-shell; a member of the genus Terebratulites of Schlotheim.

Terebridæ (tē-reb'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Terebra + -idæ.] A family of toxoglossate gastropods, typified by the genus Terebra; the awl-shells or auger-shells. The numerous species chiefly inhabit tropical seas. Also called Terebraceæ and Acusidæ. See cuts under Terebra.

teredine (ter'ē-din), n. [< L. teredo (-din-), a teredo: see teredo.] A borer, as the ship-worm or teredo. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 505.

Teredinidæ (ter-ē-din'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Teredo (-din-) + -idæ.] A family of lamellibranch mollusks, typified by the genus Teredo; the teredos or ship-worms. See Teredo.

teredo (tē-rē′dō), n. [< L. teredo, < Gr. τερηδών, a worm that gnaws wood, etc., a moth, < τείρειν = L. terere, rub: see terebra.] 1. A lamellibranch mollusk of the genus Teredo, family Teredinidæ; the ship-worm, T. navalis, conspicuous for the destruction which it occasions to ships and submerged wood, by perforating them in all directions in order to establish a habitation. It is a worm-shaped grayish-white animal, most of whose length is owing to the elongation of the united siphons or breathing-tubes conveying water to the gills. The two valves of the shell are small. The viscera are mainly contained within the valves. In excavating in the wood (the shell is the boring-instrument) every individual is careful to avoid the tube formed by its neighbor, and often a very thin leaf of wood alone is left between the cavities, which are lined with a calcareous incrustation. Many methods are in use to protect ships, piers, etc., from this destructive animal, such as copper sheathing, treating with creosote or corrosive sublimate, or driving numbers of short broad-headed nails into the timber, the rust from which spreads and prevents the animal from settling. It is said to have been originally imported from tropical climates; but it has now become an inhabitant of most harbors. (See also cut under ship-worm.) T. gigantea is a species found in the East Indies in shallow water, where it bores into the hardened mud.

Piece of Wood Perforated by Teredos.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Linnæus, 1758).] The typical genus of Teredinidæ, including T. navalis, the common teredo or ship-worm. See def. 1. Also called Septaria.—3. Any disease in plants produced by the boring of insects. Lindley, Gloss.

terek (ter′ek), n. [< Terek, a river in the Caucasus.] A kind of sandpiper, Terekia cinerea.

Terekia (tē-rē′ki-ạ), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1838), also Terechia (Bonaparte, 1841), < terek, which see.] A genus of scolopacine birds, containing only the terek sandpiper, T. cinerea, resembling the greenshank and some other tattlers, and having the bill somewhat recurved. This bird is very widely distributed, visiting in its migrations nearly all parts of the Old World, and breeding in high latitudes of Asia and Europe. It may be recognized in any plumage by the wholly white axillaries, largely white secondaries, and absence of any white on the primaries or rump. It has about twenty different New Latin names, and the genus is also called Xenus (of Kaup, 1829) and Simorhynchus (of Keyserling and Blasius, 1840, not of Merrem).

Terek (Terekia cinerea).

teres (tē′rēz), n. [NL. (sc. musculus), a round muscle, < L. teres, round, smooth: see terete.] A terete muscle; specifically, one of two terete muscles of the shoulder, proceeding from the scapula to the humerus.—Teres major (greater teres), a muscle lying externally to the teres minor, and with the latissimus dorsi forming the posterior border of the axilla. It is inserted into the posterior bicipital ridge of the humerus.—Teres minor (lesser teres), a muscle lying along the outer border of the infraspinatus, to which it is closely connected and near which it is inserted into the greater tuberosity of the humerus.

Teresian (tē-rē′si-ạn), n. [< Teresa (see def.) + -ian.] One of a branch of the Carmelites founded by Saint Teresa in 1562.

teret†, a. See terete.

terete (tē-rēt′), a. [Formerly also teret; = Sp. térete, < L. teres (teret-), round, smooth, < terere, rub: see terebra, trite.] Slender and smooth, with a circular transverse section; cylindrical or slightly tapering. See cut under petiole.

> Nature hath . . . made them [the stars] round and teret like a globe. Fotherby, Atheomastix (1622), p. 326.

Terete pronator. Same as teretipronator.

teretial (tē-rē′shạl), a. [< terete + -ial.] Same as terete. Owen. [Rare.]

tereticaudate (ter″ē-ti-kâ′dāt), a. [< L. teres (teret-), round, + cauda, a tail: see caudate.] Round-tailed; having a terete tail: specifically said of certain reptiles of a former group Tereticaudati.

teretipronator (ter″ē-ti-prō-nā′tor), n. [< L. teres (teret-), round, + pronator.] The round pronating muscle of the forearm; the pronator radii teres. See pronator. Coues, 1887.

teretiscapularis (ter″ē-ti-skap-ū-lā′ris), n.; pl. teretiscapulares (-rēz). [NL., < L. teres (teret-), terete, + scapularis.] The greater terete muscle of the shoulder-blade, commonly called teres major. See teres. Coues, 1887.

Teretistris (ter-ē-tis′tris), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1855), < Gr. τερετίζειν, whistle: often misspelled Teretristis.] A genus of American warblers, or Mniotiltidæ, peculiar to Cuba, and of 2 species, T. fernandinæ (Lembeye) and T. fornsi (Gundlach), respectively of the western and eastern parts of the island. They are small and plain-colored birds, 4¾ inches long.

teretous† (ter′ē-tus), a. [< L. teres (teret-), round, smooth, + -ous.] Same as terete.

> Teretous, or long round leaves. Sir T. Browne, Garden of Cyrus, iv.

terfle†, v. i. [ME. terflen, < AS. tearflian, roll about, a freq. form, prob. connected with terve.] To roll about; wallow. Stratmann.

terga, n. Plural of tergum.

tergal (tèr′gal), a. [< L. tergum, back, + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to the back in general; dorsal; notæal: the opposite of sternal or ventral. Specifically—2. In entom., of or pertaining to a notum, tergum, or tergite.—3. In echinoderms, dorsal in the sense of aboral; coronal: the opposite of ventral or oral: as, the tergal plates of a starfish.—4. In trilobites, of or pertaining to the axis or tergum. See cut under Trilobita.—Tergal facet, the smooth dorsal anterior surface of the somite of a crustacean, over which the posterior under surface of a preceding somite glides in flexion and extension of the abdomen.

tergant (tèr′gạnt), a. [Heraldic F., < L. tergum, back: see tergum.] In her., turning the back toward the spectator. See recursant. Also tergiant.

tergate†, n. An obsolete form of target.

> He pulled a tergate from one of his souldiours, and castynge it in to the water, standynge on it, with his spere conuaied hym selfe with the streme. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 17.

tergeminate (tèr-jem′i-nāt), a. [< L. ter, thrice, + geminatus, doubled: see geminate.] Thrice double: specifically applied to a compound leaf having at the base a pair of leaflets and then forking, with a pair on each branch, as in Anneslia tergemina (Calliandra tergemina).

tergeminous (tèr-jem′i-nus), a. [< L. tergeminus, threefold, triple, < ter, thrice, + geminus, born at the same time, twin: see gemini.] Tergeminate.

tergiant (tèr′ji-ạnt), a. In her., same as tergant.

tergiferous (tèr-jif′e-rus), a. [< L. tergum, back, + ferre = E. bear[1]: see -ferous.] Carrying or bearing on the back; dorsigerous or dorsiferous.

tergite (tèr′jīt), n. [< L. tergum, the back, + -ite[2].] The tergum, dorsum, or back of one of the somites or segments of an articulated animal, as an arthropod. A typical tergite consists of a pair of plates or pieces, right and left; but these become fused, and also a number of successive tergites may blend together, as in the cephalothorax of a crustacean.

tergitic (tèr-jit′ik), a. [< tergite + -ic.] Tergal or dorsal, as a sclerite; of or pertaining to a tergite.

tergiversate (tèr′ji-vèr-sāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. tergiversated, ppr. tergiversating. [< L. tergiversatus, pp. of tergiversari, turn one's back, shift: see tergiverse.] To shift; practise evasion; make use of shifts or subterfuges.

> Who also, as if he were conscious that his assumentum to the Platonick theology were not so defensible a thing, doth himself sometime, as it were, tergiversate and decline it, by equivocating in the word Henades, taking them for the ideas, or the intelligible gods before mentioned. Cudworth, Intellectual System, II. 361.

tergiversation (tèr″ji-vèr-sā′shọn), n. [< F. tergiversation = Sp. tergiversación = Pg. tergiversação = It. tergiversazione, < L. tergiversatio(n-), a shifting, evasion, lit. a turning of one's back, < tergiversari, pp. tergiversatus, turn one's back: see tergiversate.] 1. The act of tergiversating; a shifting; shift; subterfuge; evasion.

> Writing is to be preferred before verbal conferences, as being freer from passions and tergiversation. Abp. Bramhall. (Johnson.)

2. The act of changing one's opinions or of turning from them; the act of turning against a cause formerly advocated; fickleness or instability of conduct.

> The colonel, after all his tergiversation, lost his life in the king's service. Clarendon.

tergiversator (tèr′ji-vèr-sā-tor), n. [= F. tergiversateur = Pg. tergiversador, < L. tergiversator, one who hangs back, a laggard, < tergiversari, turn one's back: see tergiversate.] One who practises tergiversation.

tergiverse†, (tèr′ji-vèrs), v. i. [< F. tergiverser = Sp. Pg. tergiversar = It. tergiversare, < L. tergiversari, turn one's back, decline, refuse, evade, shift, < tergum, back, + versari, turn: see verse.] To turn one's back; tergiversate.

> The Briton never tergivers'd,
> But was for adverse drubbing.
> Saint George for England, ii.

tergolateral (tèr-gō-lat′e-ral), a. [< L. tergum, back, + latus (later-), side, + -al.] Of or pertaining to the tergum and the lateral plates of a cirriped. Darwin, Cirripedia, Int., p. 5.

tergorhabdite (tèr-gō-rab′dīt), n. [< L. tergum, back, + Gr. ῥάβδος, rod, + -ite[2].] In entom., one of the pieces primarily forming the upper or tergal surface of an insect's abdomen. Lacaze-Duthiers applied this name to the lower pair of plates forming the ovipositor of a female insect; they are modified tergal pieces of one of the abdominal rings.

tergum (tèr′gum), n.; pl. terga (-gạ). [NL., < L. tergum, back.] 1. The back, dorsum, or notum, especially of an arthropod.—2. The tergal or dorsal sclerite of one of the rings or somites of an arthropod or articulate animal; a tergite. A tergum is often composed of two lateral halves. In some of the thoracic segments of insects it is subdivided into parts called, from before backward, præscutum, scutum, scutellum, and postscutellum.

3. One of the two upper or dorsal plates of the shell in cirripeds. See cut under Balanus.

Terias (tē′ri-as), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1821).] A genus of butterflies, of the family Papilionidæ and subfamily Pieridinæ, comprising about a dozen species, nearly all American. The North American are T. nicippe, a small bright-orange species, and T. euterpe, still smaller and lemon-yellow in color, both of the southern United States. Their larvæ live upon cassia plants. Now placed in Eurema (Huebner, 1816).

teriet†, v. An obsolete form of tarry[2] and tarry[3].

terint†, n. Same as tarin.

> Thrustles, terins, and mavys,
> That songen for to wynne hem prys.
> Rom. of the Rose, l. 665.

★term (tèrm), n. [Early mod. E. also tearm, earlier terme; < ME. terme, < OF. terme, also in less vernacular form termine = Pr. terme = Sp. término = Pg. termino = It. termine, termine = D. termijn = G. Sw. Dan. termin, < L. terminus, OL. also termo (termon-), termen (termin-), a bound, boundary, limit, end, ML. (and Rom.) also a time, period, also a definition (?), word, covenant, etc.; = Gr. τέρμων (τερμον-), τέρμα (τερματ-), a boundary-line, limit; prob. akin to E. thrum[1], tram[1]. From L. terminus are also ult. E. terminus, terminal, terminate, termine, determine, determinate, etc., conterminous, etc.] 1. A bound; a boundary; limit; the extremity of anything, or that which limits its extent; a confine; end; termination; completion.

> Here I take the to my liue: tac thou non other to terme of liue. Politi. al Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 229.
> God was careful to secure us from death by removing the lepers from the camp, . . . and putting a term between the living and the dead. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 885.
>
> At the decline of day,
> Winding above the mountain's snowy term,
> New banners shone. Shelley, Revolt of Islam, vi. 18.
> Who does not sometimes . . . await with curious complacency the speedy term of his own conversation with finite nature? Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 240.

2. In geom., the extreme of any magnitude, or that which limits or bounds its extent: as, the terms of a line are points, the terms of a superficies are lines, and the terms of a solid are superficies. See also def. 9.—3†. Outcome; final issue.

> Yet ought mens good endevours them confirme,
> And guyde the heavenly causes to their constant terme.
> Spenser, F. Q., III. iii. 25.

4†. A figure of Terminus, the god of boundaries; a terminal figure. See terminus, 3.

> An arbour feigned of goldsmith's-work, the ornament of which was borne up with termes of satyrs. B. Jonson, Chloridia.
> On either side of the Gate stood a great French Terme of stone, aduanced vpon wodden Pedestalls. Dekker, Kings Entertainment (Works, ed. Pearson, I. 278).

5. In ship-building, a piece of carved work placed under each end of the taffrail, and extending to the foot-rail of the balcony. Also called term-piece.—6. A space or period of time to which limits have been set; the time or period through which something runs its course, or lasts or is intended to last: as, he was engaged for a term of five years; his term of office has expired.

> This lady, that was left at home,
> Hath wonder that the king ne come > Hoom, for hit was a longe terme.
> Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 79.

> A spirit,
> To whom, for certaine tearme of yeares, t' inherit
> His ease and pleasure with aboundant wealth,
> He hath made sale of his soules dearest health.
> Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 53.

> When a race has lived its term it comes no more again.
> Emerson, Conduct of Life.

Specifically — (a) In universities, colleges, and schools, one of certain stated periods during which instruction is regularly given to students or pupils. At the University of Cambridge, England, there are three terms in the university year — namely, Michaelmas or October term, Lent or January term, and Easter or midsummer term. At the University of Oxford there are four terms — namely, Michaelmas, Hilary, Easter, and Trinity. In American universities and colleges there are usually three terms, beginning in September, January, and April, and called first, second, and third, or fall, winter, and spring terms respectively. (b) In law, the period during which a court of justice may hold its sessions from day to day for the trial of causes; a part of the year in which the justices of the superior common-law courts of general jurisdiction hold sessions of the courts, as distinguished from vacations, during which, on religious and business grounds, attendance at the courts cannot be required from parties or witnesses. The importance of the distinction between term time and vacation, in both American and English law, is in the fact that for the just protection of the public a court can only exist and exercise its powers within the time as well as at the place prescribed by law; and, while many ministerial acts, such as the bringing of actions, and the course of pleading, the entry of judgment, the issue of process, etc., can be carried on in the clerk's office upon any secular day, actual sessions of the court itself can only be held during term time. In England, before the present judicature act, the law terms were four in number — namely, Hilary term (compare Hilarymas), beginning on the 11th and ending on the 31st of January; Easter term, from about the 15th of April to the 8th of May; Trinity term, from the 22d of May to the 12th of June; and Michaelmas term, from the 2d to the 25th of November. These have now been superseded as terms for the administration of justice by "sittings," bearing similar names. For the High Court of Justice in London and Middlesex the Hilary sittings extend from the 11th of January to the Wednesday before Easter, the Easter sittings from the Tuesday after Easter week to the Friday before Whitsunday, the Trinity sittings from the Tuesday after Whitsun week to the 8th of August, and the Michaelmas sittings from the 2d of November to the 21st of December.

> Coryat, Crudities, I. 40, sig. D.

> Doll. When begins the term?
> Chart. Why? hast any suits to be tried at Westminster?
> Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, i. 2.

> I went to the Temple, it being Michaelmas Tearme.
> Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 15, 1640.

> The law terms were formerly the great times of resort to London, not only for business, but pleasure. . . . Greene calls one of his pamphlets . . . "A Peale of New Villanies rung out, being Musicall to all Gentlemen, Lawyers, Farmers, and all sorts of People that come up to the Tearme."
> Nares.

(c) An estate or interest in land to be enjoyed for a fixed period: called more fully term of years, term for years. (d) The period of time for which such an estate is held. (e) In Scots law, a certain time fixed by authority of a court within which a party is allowed to establish by evidence his averment.

7. An appointed or set time. [Obsolete except in specific uses below.]

> Yif that ye the terme rekne wolde,
> As I or other trewe lovers sholde,
> I pleyne not, God wot, beforn my day.
> Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2510.

> Merlin seide that the terme drough faste on that it sholde be do.
> Mer.in (E. E. T. S.), iii. 563.

Specifically — (a) A day on which rent or interest is payable. In England and Ireland there are four days in the year which are called terms, or more commonly quarter-days, and which are appointed for the settling of rents — namely, Lady day, March 25th; Midsummer, June 24th; Michaelmas day, September 29th; and Christmas, December 25th. The terms in Scotland corresponding to these are Candlemas, February 2d; Whitsunday, May 15th; Lammas, August 1st; and Martinmas, November 11th. In Scotland houses are let from May 28th for a year or a period of years. The legal terms in Scotland for the payment of rent or interest are Whitsunday, May 15th, and Martinmas, November 11th, and these days are most commonly known as terms. (b) The day, occurring half-yearly, on which farm and domestic servants in Great Britain receive their wages or enter upon a new period of service.

8. The menstrual period of women.

> In times past . . . no young man married before he slew an enemie, nor the woman before she had her termes, which time was therefore festiuall.
> Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 847.

9. In math.: (a) The antecedent or consequent of a ratio.

> Proportionality consisteth at the least in three terms.
> Euclid, Elements, tr. by Rudd (1651), bk. v., def. 9. [It is [properly def. 8.]

(b) In algebra, a part of an expression joined to the rest by the sign of addition, or by that of subtraction considered as adding a negative quantity. Thus, in the expression $x^a + b - y + z(u + v)$, the first term is $x^a + b$, the second is $-y$, and the third is $z(u + v)$, equivalent to the sum of two terms zu and zv.

10. In logic, a name, especially the subject or predicate of a proposition; also, a name connected with another name by a relation; a correlative. The word term, in its Latin form terminus, was used by Boëthius to translate Aristotle's ὅρος, probably borrowed by him from the nomenclature of mathematical proportions. Aristotle says: "I call a term that into which a proposition is resolved, as the predicate or that of which it is predicated." The implication is that a proposition is composed of two terms; but this is incorrect. For, on the one hand, no complex of terms can make a proposition; for a term expresses a mere abstract conception, while a proposition expresses the compulsion of a reality, and so is true or false; and, on the other hand, a proposition need contain but one term, as [the fool has said in his heart] "There is no God"; and indeed the abstract or conceptual part of any proposition may be regarded as a single complex term, as when we express "No man is mortal" in the form "Anything whatever is either-non-man-or-mortal." Hence — 11. A word or phrase expressive of a definite conception, as distinguished from a mere particle or syncategorematic word; a word or phrase particularly definite and explicit; especially, a word or phrase used in a recognized and definite meaning in some branch of science. Thus, a contradiction in terms is an explicit contradiction; to express one's opinion in set terms is to state it explicitly and directly.

> They mowe wel chiteren, as doon thise jayes,
> And in her termes sette her lust and peyne,
> But to her purpos shul they never atteyne.
> Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 387.

> A fool

> Locke, Human Understanding, III. vi. 32.

> When common words are appropriated as technical terms, this must be done so that they are not ambiguous in their application.
> Whewell, Philos. Inductive Sciences (ed. 1840), I. lxx.

12. pl. Propositions stated and offered for acceptance; conditions; stipulations: as, the terms of a treaty; hence, sometimes, conditions as regards price, rates, or charge: as, board and lodging on reasonable terms; on one's own terms; lowest terms offered.

> If we can make our peace
> Upon such large terms and so absolute.
> Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 1. 186.

13. pl. Relative position; relation; footing: with on or upon: as, to be on good or bad terms with a person.

> 'Tis not well
> That you and I should meet upon such terms
> As now we meet.
> Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 1. 10.

> I thought you two had been upon very good terms.
> B. Jonson, Epicœne, i. 1.

14. pl. State; situation; circumstances; conditions.

> The terms of our estate may not endure > Hazard so near us.
> Shak., Hamlet, iii. 3. 5.

> In the Relation of Hæmons Death, his Love is related too, and that with all the Life and Pathos imaginable. But the Description is within the Terms of Honour.
> J. Collier, Short View (ed. 1698), p. 29.

[Shakspere uses terms often in a loose, periphrastical way: as, "To keep the terms of my honour precise," M. W. of W., ii. 2. 22 (that is, all that concerns my honor); "In terms of choice I am not solely led by nice direction of a maiden's eye" (that is, with respect to the choice). In other cases it is used in the sense of 'point,' 'particular feature,' 'peculiarity': as, "All terms of pity," All's Well, ii. 3. 173.]

15. In astrol., a part of a zodiacal sign in which a planet is slightly dignified; an essential dignity. — Absolute term. See absolute. — Abstract term, the name of a character or kind of fact, not of a thing. Thus, uniform acceleration is an abstract term, but material particle is a concrete term. — Act term. See act. — Ampliative term, a term whose denotation is extended beyond what ordinarily attaches to it. — Ampliative term, a term which extends the denotation of another. Thus, in the sentence "No man works miracles, nor ever did," the last word did is said to be an ampliative term, because it extends the denotation of man to the men who formerly lived. — Attendant terms, long leases or mortgages held by the owner or his trustee as a distinct and additional title, to make his estate more secure. Robinson. — Categorematic or categoreumatic term, a term expressive of a definite conception. — Circumduction of the term. See circumduction. — Common term, a general name; a name applicable to whatever there may or might be having certain general characters. — Complex term. See complex notion, under complex. — Concrete term, the name of a thing: opposed to abstract term (which see, above). — Conflictive, consonant, correlative terms. See the adjectives. — Contradiction in terms. See contradiction, and def. 11. — Definite term. See definite. — Denominative term, a term consisting of a word plainly derived from another word. — Discrete term. See discrete, 1. — Easter term. See def. 6 (a) and (b). — Equity term. See equity. — Exponible term, a term which must not be interpreted according to the general principles of language, but which bears a peculiar meaning not to be inferred from its formation. Such, for example, are most of the phrases of the differential calculus, according to the theory of limits. — Extreme term of a syllogism, one of the terms which appears in the conclusion. — Familiar term, a word or phrase which bears or has borne a scientifically precise meaning, but which has been caught up by those who do not think with precision. Such are dynamic, objective, sanction, supply and demand, values (in painting), and so on. — Finite term. See finite. — Fixed term, a term having a single well-settled meaning, as binomial theorem, principle of excluded middle, psychical research, life-insurance. — General term, a term of court held by the full bench, or a sufficient number of judges to represent the full bench, for the purposes chiefly of appellate jurisdiction. [U. S.] — Hilary term. See def. 6 (a) and (b). — Indefinite term. See indefinite. — Intermediate terms. See intermediate. — In terms, in precise definite words or phraseology; in set terms; in a way or by means of expressions that cannot be misunderstood; specifically; definitely. See def. 11.

> Passing ouer Tigris, [he] disturbed the Romane Prouince of Mesopotamia, deuouring in hope, and threatning in tearmes, all those Asian Prouinces.
> Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 356.

In terms of. (a) In the language or phraseology peculiar to (something else). (b) In modes of: a common misuse as applied to modes of thought (properly, a term is opposed to an idea).

> Most persons, on being asked in what sort of terms they imagine words, will say "in terms of hearing."
> W. James, Prin. of Psychology, II. 63.

Major term, that extreme of a syllogism which appears as the predicate of the conclusion. See syllogism. — Michaelmas term. See def. 6 (a) and (b). — Middle term, that term of a syllogism which occurs in both premises, but not in the conclusion. — Minor term, that extreme of a syllogism which appears as the subject of the conclusion. See syllogism. — Negative term, a term which determines its object by means of exclusions. Thus, immediate consciousness is a negative term, since it indicates the most simple and direct mode of thought by excluding that which is circuitous or sophisticated. — Outstanding term, in the English law of real property, a term of years, commonly one thousand or less, given, usually to trustees of a settlement, to secure, by way of lien or charge, income or other payments to one or more of the family to whom the settler of the trust desired to secure them, as paramount to his transfer of the estate subject thereto to a particular heir or other person. The effect of giving such a term in trust was, not to give the trustees possession immediate, but to give them the right to take the rents and profits, or to mortgage, etc., in case the principal grantee under the settlement failed to keep up the periodical payments required. In the course of years, after all the payments required had been made, and the object of the term was accomplished, if it did not by the provisions of the deed then cease, it continued to be an outstanding term, although "satisfied," until by recent legislation the cessation of satisfied terms was provided for. Meanwhile, it was usual for purchasers of land subject to an outstanding term to take an assignment of the term in such a way as not to merge it with the fee, but it, being thereafter "attendant upon the inheritance," was an additional security for the title as against questions which might have arisen since the making of the settlement. — Partial term, in the logical nomenclature of De Morgan, an undistributed term, or term not entirely excluded from any sphere by the proposition in which it occurs: opposed to total or distributed term. Both terms are partial in the propositions "Some X is Y" and "Everything is either an X or a Y." Both terms are total in the propositions "No X is Y" and "Something is neither X nor Y." The term X is partial and Y total in the propositions "Every Y is an X" and "Some X is not Y." — Positive term, privative connotative term, reciprocal terms, relative term, singular term. See positive, privative, etc. — Simple term, a term not compounded of other terms by logical addition and multiplication. — Speaking terms. See speak, v. i. — Special term, a term of court held by a single judge: commonly used in reference to a court held without a jury. — Term of art, a word or phrase having a special signification in a certain branch of knowledge. — Term of a substitution. See substitution. — Term of relation, a name or thing to which some other name or thing is considered as relative; an object of relation. Thus, in the expression mother of a boy, boy is the term of the relation of which mother is the subject. — Term of resemblance†. See resemblance. — Term of similitude†. Same as term of resemblance. — Term of thought, that which is the conclusion or upshot of reflection or deliberation. — Terms in gross, terms vested in trustees for the use of persons not entitled to the freehold or inheritance. They pass to the personal representatives of the cestui que trust, are alienable, and are subject to debts, in the main, like legal estates. Minor. — Terms of sale. See sale†. — The general term of a series. See series. — Third term, the minor term of a syllogism. So called owing to Aristotle's usual form of statement. — To bring to terms, to reduce to submission or to conditions.

> He to no Terms can bring
> One Twirl of that reluctant Thing.
> Congreve, An Impossible Thing.

To come to terms, to agree; come to an agreement; also, to yield; submit. — To eat one's terms. See eat. — To keep a term, to give attendance during a term of study. See the second quotation.

> He will get enough there to enable him to keep his terms at the University.
> Bp. W. Lloyd, in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 188.

> A student, in order to keep a term, must dine in the hall of his inn three nights, if he be a member of any of the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Durham, London, Dublin, Queen's (Belfast), St. Andrew's, Aberdeen, Glasgow, or Edinburgh. In all other cases he must dine six nights, being present in both instances at the grace before dinner, during the whole of dinner, and until the concluding grace shall have been said.
> Slater.

To keep Hilary term†, to be joyful or merry.

This joy, when God speaks peace to the soul, is ineffable gaudium. . . . It gives end to all jars, doubts, and differences, . . . and makes a man keep Hilary-term all his life. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 68.

To make terms, to come to an agreement.—To speak in term†, to speak in precise language, or in set terms. See def. 11.

Seyde I nat wel? I can not speke in terme.
Chaucer, Prol. to Pardoner's Tale, l. 25.

To stand upon one's terms†, to insist upon conditions: followed by with.

I had rather be the most easy, tame, and resigned believer in the most gross and imposing church in the world . . . than one of those great and philosophical minds who stand upon their terms with God.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. viii.

Total term. See partial term, above.—Transcendent term, a term which signifies something not included under any of the ten predicaments, especially everything and nothing.—Trinity term. See def. 6 (a) and (b).—Vague term, a word or phrase sometimes used as a term, but without fixed meaning.=Syn. 11. Word, Term, Expression, Phrase, vocable, name. Word is generic; term and expression are specific: every term is a word; a phrase is a combination of words generally less than a sentence; an expression is generally either a word or a phrase, but may be a sentence. A term is, in this connection, especially a word of exact meaning: as, "phlebitis" is a medical term. See diction.

term (tėrm), v. t. [Early mod. E. also tearm; < term, n.] To name; call; denominate; designate.

A certeine pamphlet which he termed a cooling carde for Philautus, yet generally to be applyed to all louers.
Lyly, Euphues, Anat. of Wit, p. 105.

Britan hath bin anciently term'd Albion, both by the Greeks and Romans. Milton, Hist. Eng., i.

terma (tėr'mą), n.; pl. termata (-ma-tą). [NL. (B. G. Wilder, 1881), < Gr. τέρμα, a limit, terminus.] The lamina terminalis, or terminal lamina, of the brain; a thin lamina between the præcommissura and the chiasma, constituting a part of the boundary of the aula. See cut under sulcus.

termagancy (tėr'ma-gan-si), n. [< termagan(t) + -cy.] The state of being termagant; turbulence; tumultuousness.

termagant (tėr'ma-gant), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also Termagaunt, also Turmagant, also Ternagaunt; < ME. Termagant, Termagaunt, < OF. *Tervagant, Tervagan, Tarvagant, also Trivagant, Tryvigant*, < It. Trivigante, Trivagante, Tervagante, etc.; prob. a name of Ar. origin brought over by the Crusaders. Of the various theories invented to explain the name, one refers it, in the It. form Trivagante, to lunar mythology, < L. tres (tri-), three, + vagan(t-)s, ppr. of vagare, wander; i. e. the moon wandering under the three names of Selene (or Luna) in heaven, Artemis (or Diana) on the earth, and Persephone (Proserpine) in the lower world.]

I. n. 1. [cap.] An imaginary deity, supposed to have been worshiped by the Mohammedans, and introduced into the moralities and other shows, in which he figured as a most violent and turbulent personage.

Child, by Termagaunt,
But-if thou prike out of myn haunt,
Anon I sle thy stede.
Chaucer, Sir Thopas, l. 99.

I would have such a fellow whipped for o'erdoing Termagant; it out-herods Herod. Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2. 15.

I'le march where my Captaine leads, wer't into the Presence of the great Termagaunt.
Heywood, Royal King (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 23).

2†. A turbulent, brawling person, male or female.

This terrible termagant, this Nero, this Pharaoh.
Bp. Bale, Yet a Course at the Romyshe Foxe, fol. 39 b [(1543). (Latham.)

Wealth may do us good service, but if it get the mastery of our trust it will turn tyrant, termagant; we condemn ourselves to our own galleys.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 149.

3. A boisterous, brawling, or turbulent woman; a shrew; a virago; a scold.

She threw his periwig into the fire. Well, said he, thou art a brave termagant. Tatler.

If she [woman] be passionate, want of manners makes her a termagant and a scold, which is much at one with Lunatic. Defoe (Arber's Eng. Garner, II. 267).

II. a. Violent; turbulent; boisterous; quarrelsome; scolding; of women, shrewish.

'Twas time to counterfeit, or that hot termagant Scot had paid me scot and lot too. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 4. 114.

Yet it is oftentimes too late with some of you young, termagant, flashy sinners—you have all the guilt of the intention, and none of the pleasure of the practice.
Congreve, Old Bachelor, i. 4.

Hath any man a termagant wife?
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 136.

termagantly (tėr'ma-gant-li), adv. In a termagant, boisterous, or scolding manner; like a termagant; outrageously; scandalously. Tom Brown, Works, II. 148. (Davies.) termata, n. Plural of terma.

termatic (tėr-mat'ik), a. and n. [< terma(t-) + -ic.] I. a. Pertaining to the terma, or lamina terminalis of the brain.

II. n. The termatic artery, a small vessel arising from the junction of the precerebral arteries, or from the precommunicant when that vessel exists, and distributed to the terma, the adjacent cerebral cortex, and the genu. New York Med. Jour., March 21, 1885, p. 325.

term-day (tėrm'dā), n. [< ME. terme-day; < term + day[1].] 1. A fixed or appointed day.

He had broke his terme-day
To come to her.
Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 730.

2. Same as term, 7 (a) or (b).—3. Specifically, one of a series of days appointed for taking special and generally very frequent observations of magnetic or meteorological elements at different stations, in accordance with a uniform system.

termer (tėr'mėr), n. [< term + -er[1].] 1. One who travels to attend a court term; formerly, one who resorted to London in term time for dishonest practices or for intrigues—the court terms being times of great resort to London both for business and for pleasure.

Salewood. Why, he was here three days before the Exchequer gaped.
Rear. Fie, such an early termer?
Middleton, Michaelmas Term, i. 1.

2. In law, same as termor.

Termes (tėr'mēz), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1748), < LL. termes, a wood-worm: see termite.] 1. An important genus of isopterous insects, typical of the family Termitidæ. It includes those termites or white ants which have the head large, rounded, and with two ocelli, the prothorax small and heart-shaped, the costal area free, and the plantula

White Ant (Termes flavipes).
a, larva; b, winged male; c, worker; d, soldier; e, large female; f, nymph. (Lines show natural sizes.)

absent. It is a wide-spread genus of many species. T. flavipes of North America is a well-known example which bores in the timbers of dwellings, particularly south of the latitude of Washington, and often causes great annoyance, not only from destruction of property, but from the swarming of the winged individuals at certain seasons of the year. 2. [l. c.] A termite. Imp. Dict.

term-fee (tėrm'fē), n. In law, a fee or certain sum allowed to an attorney as costs for each term his client's cause is in court.

terminable (tėr'mi-na-bl), a. [= It. terminabile, < L. as if terminabilis*, < terminare, terminate: see terminate.] Capable of being terminated; limitable; coming to an end after a certain term: as, a terminable annuity.

terminableness (tėr'mi-na-bl-nes), n. The ★state of being terminable.

terminal (tėr'mi-nal), a. and n. [< F. terminal = Pr. termenal = Sp. Pg. terminal = It. terminale, < LL. terminalis, pertaining to a boundary or to the end, terminal, final, < L. terminus, a bound, boundary, limit, end: see term, terminus.] I. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or forming the terminus or termination of something; forming a boundary or extreme limit; pertaining to a term (see term, 1 and 2): as, a terminal pillar; the terminal edge of a polyhedron; the terminal facilities of a railway.—2. In bot., growing at the end of a branch or stem; terminating: as, a terminal peduncle, flower, or spike.—3. In logic, constituted by or relating to a term.—4. Occurring in every term; representing a term.

If he joins his College Boat Club . . . he will be called upon for a terminal subscription of £1 at least.
Dickens's Dict. Oxford, p. 52.

5. In anat. and zoöl., ending a set or series of like parts; apical: as, the middle sacral artery is the terminal branch of the abdominal aorta; the last coccygeal bone is the terminal one of the coccyx; a terminal mark or spine; the terminal joint of an antenna. See cuts under Colaspis and Erotylus.—Terminal alveolus, an air-sac, or pulmonary alveolus.—Terminal dementia, dementia forming the final and permanent stage of many cases of acute insanity, such as mania, melancholia, or other psychoneurosis.—Terminal figure. Same as terminus, 3.—Terminal margin of the wing, in entom., a portion of the wing-margin furthest removed from the base, between the costal or anterior and the posterior margin.—Terminal moraine. See moraine.—Terminal mouth, in entom., a mouth situated at the end of the head, as in most Coleoptera.—Terminal pedestal, a name often given to a pedestal which tapers toward the bottom. The name is inexact, as such a pedestal is of gaine shape and not terminal shape.—Terminal quantity, the quantity of a term, as universal or particular. The phrase implies that the quantities of a proposition attach to the terms; but this is incorrect. The quantities really belong to the subjects, or purely designated elements, and not to the terms, or conceptual elements. Thus, in the proposition "Every man is son of a woman" there are three terms but only two quantities, because only two subjects.—Terminal stigma. See stigma, 6.—Terminal value, terminal form, in math., the last and most complete value or form given to an expression.—Terminal velocity, in gunnery, the velocity with which a projectile strikes an object at the end of its flight: also called striking velocity.

Terminal Pedestal.

II. n. 1. That which terminates; the extremity; the end; especially, in elect., the arrangement at the two ends of the electric circuit of an apparatus, devised for connecting it with the outside circuit, as clamping screw, etc.—2. In crystal., the plane or planes which form the extremity of a crystal.—3. A charge made by a railway for the use of its termini or stations, or for the handling of freight at stations.

The cost of collection, loading, covering, unloading, and delivering, which are the chief items included under the determination of terminals, falls upon the railways for most descriptions of freight.
Contemporary Rev., LI. 82.

4. A terminus, as of a railroad. [Recent.]

Terminalia[1] (tėr-mi-nā'li-ą), n. pl. [L., neut. pl. of (LL.) terminalis, pertaining to boundaries or to Terminus: see terminal.] In Rom. antiq., a festival celebrated annually in honor of Terminus, the god of boundaries. It was held on the 23d of February, its essential feature being a survey or perambulation of boundaries.

Terminalia[2] (tėr-mi-nā'li-ą), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1767), so called with ref. to the crowding of the leaves at the ends of the twigs; < LL. terminalis, pertaining to the end, terminal: see terminal.] A genus of plants, of the family Combretaceæ, type of the tribe Terminalieæ. It is characterized by apetalous flowers consisting mainly of a cylindrical calyx-tube consolidated with the one-celled ovary, five calyx-teeth surmounting a somewhat bell-shaped border, and ten exserted stamens in two series. The ovary contains two or rarely three pendulous ovules, and ripens into an ovoid angled compressed or two- to five-winged fruit which contains a hard one-seeded stone. There are about 150 species, natives of the tropics, less frequent in America than in the old world. They are trees or shrubs, usually with alternate entire and petioled leaves crowded at the ends of the branches. The small sessile flowers are green, white, or rarely of other colors, usually forming loose elongated spikes often produced from scaly buds before the leaves. They are often tall forest-trees, as T. latifolia, the broadleaf, a common species in Jamaica, which reaches 100 feet. A sweet conserve, known as chebula, is made from the fruit in India. For several species of the wingless section Myrobalanus, see myrobalan. T. Catappa, the (Malabar) almond, in the West Indies also country almond, is a handsome tree from 30 to 80 feet high, with horizontal whorled branches, producing a large white almond-like seed, eaten raw or roasted and compared to the filbert in taste; it is a native of India, Arabia, and tropical Africa, cultivated in many warm regions, naturalized in America from Cuba to Guiana. In Mauritius T. Mauritiana, known as false benzoin, yields a fragrant resin used as incense. Ink is made in India from the astringent galls which form on the twigs of T. Chebula. Many species produce a valuable wood. T. Bellerica, the babela or myrobalan-wood, is valuable in India for making planks, canoes, etc.; T. Chebula, known as harra, and T. bialata, known as chugalam, are used in making furniture. T. tomentosa, the della-madoo of Pegu, is a source of masts and spars for ships. See also saj. The latter and T. Arjuna, the urjoon of India, with about a dozen other species, are sometimes separated as a genus Pentaptera, now made a section, on account of their remarkable leathery egg-shaped fruit, which is traversed lengthwise by from five to seven equidistant and similar wings.

Terminaliaceæ (tėr-mi-nā-li-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Jaume-St.-Hilaire, 1805), ⟨ Terminalia[2] + -aceæ.] The earliest name of the family of plants now known as Combretaceæ.

terminally (tėr′mi-nạl-i), adv. With respect to a termination; at the extreme end.

terminant† (tėr′mi-nạnt), n. [⟨ L. terminan(t-)s, ppr. of terminare, terminate: see terminate.] Termination; ending.

Neither of both are of like terminant, either by good orthography or in naturall sound.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 67.

terminate (tėr′mi-nāt), v.; pret. and pp. terminated, ppr. terminating. [⟨ L. terminatus, pp. of terminare, set bounds to, bound, limit, end, close, terminate, ⟨ terminus, a bound, limit, end: see term, terminus. Cf. termine.] I. trans. 1. To bound; limit; form the extreme outline of; set a boundary or limit to; define.

It is no church, at all, my lord! it is a spire that I have built against a tree, a field or two off, to terminate the prospect. One must always have a church, or an obelisk, or a something, to terminate the prospect, you know. That's a rule in taste, my lord!
Colman, Clandestine Marriage, ii.

She was his life,
The ocean to the river of his thoughts,
Which terminated all. Byron, The Dream.

2. To end; put an end to.—3. To complete; put the closing or finishing touch to; perfect.

During this interval of calm and prosperity, he [Michael Angelo] terminated two figures of slaves, destined for the tomb, in an incomparable style of art.
J. S. Harford, Michael Angelo, I. xi.

=Syn. 2. To close, conclude.

II. intrans. 1. To be limited in space by a point, line, or surface; stop short; end.

The left extremity of the stomach [of the kangaroo] is bifid, and terminates in two round cul-de-sacs.
Owen, Anat., § 225.

2. To cease; come to an end in time; end.

Human aid and human solace terminate at the grave.
D. Webster, Speech commemorative of Adams and [Jefferson, Aug. 2, 1826.

The festival terminated at the morning-call to prayer.
E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, II. 205.

terminate (tėr′mi-nāt), a. [⟨ L. terminatus, pp.: see the verb.] Capable of coming to an end; limited; bounded: as, a terminate decimal. A terminate number is an integer, a mixed ★number, or a vulgar fraction. See interminate.

termination (tėr-mi-nā′shọn), n. [⟨ OF. termination, vernacularly terminaison, F. terminaison = Sp. terminación = Pg. terminação = It. terminazione, ⟨ L. terminatio(n-), a bounding, fixing of bounds, determining, ⟨ terminare, pp. terminatus, bound, limit: see terminate.] 1. Bound; limit in space or extent: as, the termination of a field.—2. The act of limiting, or setting bounds; the act of terminating; the act of ending or concluding: as, Thursday was set for the termination of the debate.—3. End in time or existence: as, the termination of life.

From the termination of the schism, as the popes found their ambition thwarted beyond the Alps, it was diverted more and more towards schemes of temporal sovereignty.
Hallam, Middle Ages, ii. 7.

4. In gram., the end or ending of a word; the part annexed to the root or stem of an inflected word (a case-ending or other formative), or in general a syllable or letter, or number of letters, at the end of a word.—5. Conclusion; completion; issue; result: as, the affair was brought to a happy termination.—6. Decision; determination. [Rare.]

We have rules of justice in us; to those rules
Let us apply our angers: you can consider
The want in others of these terminations,
And how unfurnish'd they appear.
Fletcher (and another), Love's Pilgrimage, ii. 1.

7. That which ends or finishes off, as, in architecture, a finial or a pinnacle.—8†. Word; term.

She speaks poniards, and every word stabs; if her breath were as terrible as her terminations, there were no living near her; she would infect to the north star.
Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1. 256.

9. The extremity of a crystal when formed by one or more crystalline faces. A crystal whose natural end has been broken off is said to be without termination.

terminational (tėr-mi-nā′shọn-ạl), a. [⟨ termination + -al.] Of, pertaining to, forming, or formed by a termination; specifically, forming the concluding syllable.

Terminational or other modifications.
Craik, Hist. Eng. Lit., I. 52.

terminative (tėr′mi-nā-tiv), a. [= F. terminatif = Sp. Pg. It. terminativo; as terminate + -ive.] Tending or serving to terminate; definitive; absolute; not relative.

This objective, terminative presence flows from the fœcundity of the Divine Nature.
Bp. Rust, Discourse of Truth, § 15.

terminatively (tėr′mi-nā-tiv-li), adv. In a terminative manner; absolutely; without regard to anything else.

Neither can this be eluded by saying that, though the same worship be given to the image of Christ as to Christ himself, yet it is not done in the same way; for it is terminatively to Christ or God, but relatively to the image: that is, to the image for God's or Christ's sake.
Jer. Taylor, Dissuasive from Popery, I. ii. § 11.

terminator (tėr′mi-nā-tọr), n. [⟨ LL. terminator, one who limits, ⟨ L. terminare, terminate: see terminate.] 1. One who or that which terminates.—2. In astron., the dividing-line between the illuminated and the unilluminated part of a heavenly body, especially the moon.

Except at full-moon we can see where the daylight struggles with the dark along the line of the moon's sunrise or sunset. This line is called the terminator. It is broken in the extreme, because the surface is as rough as possible. H. W. Warren, Astronomy, p. 155.

terminatory (tėr′mi-nā-tọ-ri), a. [⟨ terminate + -ory.] Bounding; limiting; terminating.

termine† (tėr′min), v. t. [⟨ ME. terminen, termynen, ⟨ OF. terminer = Sp. Pg. terminar = It. terminare, ⟨ L. terminare, set bounds to, bound, determine, end: see terminate. Cf. determine.] 1. To limit; bound; terminate.

Eningia had in owlde tyme the tytle of a kingedome. . . . It is termined on the north syde by the southe line of Ostobothnia, and is extended by the mountaynes.
R. Eden, tr. of Jacobus Ziglerus (First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 306).

2. To come to a conclusion regarding; determine; decide.

Foulis of ravyne
Han chosen first by playn electioun
The terselet of the faucon to diffyne
Al here sentence, as hem leste to termyne.
Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 530.

terminer (tėr′mi-nėr), n. [⟨ OF. terminer, inf. used as a noun: see termine.] In law, a determining: as, oyer and terminer. See court of oyer and terminer, under oyer.

termini, n. Plural of terminus.

terminine†, n. [Appar. an error for terminant.] A limit or boundary.

All jointly move upon one axletree, Whose terminine [var. termine] is termed the world's wide pole. Marlowe, Faustus, ii. 2 (ed. Bullen).

terminism (tėr′mi-nizm), n. [⟨ L. terminus, a term (see term), + -ism.] 1. In logic, the doctrine of William of Occam, who seeks to reduce all logical problems to questions of language.—2. In theol., the doctrine that God has assigned to every one a term of repentance, after which all opportunity for salvation is lost.

terminist (tėr′mi-nist), n. [⟨ termin-ism + -ist.] An upholder of the doctrine of terminism, in either sense.

terminological (ter″mi-nọ-loj′i-kạl), a. [⟨ terminolog-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to terminology.

terminologically (tėr″mi-nọ-loj′i-kạl-i), adv. In a terminological manner; in the way of terminology; as regards terminology. F. B. Winslow, Obscure Diseases of Brain and Mind. (Latham.)

terminology (tėr-mi-nol′ọ-ji), n. [= F. terminologie, ⟨ L. terminus, a term, + Gr. -λογία, ⟨ λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] 1. The doctrine or science of technical terms; teaching or theory regarding the proper use of terms.

They are inquiries to determine not so much what is, as what should be, the meaning of a name; which, like other practical questions of terminology, requires for its solution that we should enter . . . into the properties not merely of names but of the things named.
J. S. Mill, Logic, I. viii. § 7.

2. Collectively, the terms used in any art, science, or the like; nomenclature: as, the terminology of botany. It is sometimes restricted to the terms employed to describe the characters of things, as distinguished from their names, or a nomenclature. See nomenclature, 2, and compare vocabulary.

Hence botany required not only a fixed system of names of plants, but also an artificial system of phrases fitted to describe their parts: not only a Nomenclature, but also a Terminology.
Whewell, Philos. of Inductive Sciences, I. p. lxi.

terminthus† (tėr-min′thus), n.; pl. terminthi (-thī). [NL., ⟨ Gr. τέρμινθος, earlier form of τερέβινθος, terebinth: see terebinth.] In med., a sort of carbuncle, which assumes the figure and blackish-green color of the fruit of the turpentine-tree.

terminus (tėr′mi-nus), n.; pl. termini (-nī). [L. terminus, a bound, boundary, limit, the god of boundaries, the end: see term.] 1. A boundary; a limit; a stone, post, or other mark used to indicate the boundary of a property.—2. [cap.] In Rom. myth., the god of boundaries; the deity who presided over boundaries or landmarks. He was represented with a human head, but without feet or arms, to intimate that he never moved from whatever place he occupied.

3. A bust or figure of the upper part of the human body, terminating in a plain block of rectangular form; a half-statue or bust, not placed upon but incorporated with, and as it were immediately springing out of, the square pillar which serves as its pedestal. Termini are employed as pillars, balusters, or detached ornaments for niches, etc. Compare gaine. Also called term and terminal figure.

Terminus.
Archaistic Greek statue of Pan, in the British Museum.

4. Termination; limit; goal; end.

Was the Mosaic economy of their nation self-dissolved as having reached its appointed terminus or natural euthanasy, and lost itself in a new order of things?
De Quincey, Secret Societies, ii.

5. The extreme station at either end of a railway, or important section of a railway.—6. The point to which a vector carries a given or assumed point.—Terminus ad quem, the point to which (something tends or is directed); the terminating-point.—Terminus a quo, the point from which (something starts); the starting-point.

termitarium (tėr-mi-tā′ri-um), n.; pl. termitaria (-ạ). [NL., ⟨ Termes (Termit-) + -arium.] 1. A termitary; a nest or mound made by termites, or white ants. Those of some tropical species, built on the ground, are a yard or two in height, and of various forms. Others are built in trees, and are globular or irregular in shape; from these central nests covered passages run in all directions, as far as the insects make their excursions, and new ones are constantly being constructed, the termites never working without shelter.

2. A cage or vessel for studying termites under artificial conditions.

Last night I took a worker Eutermes from a nest in my garden and dropped it into the midst of workers in my termitarium.
P. H. Dudley, Trans. New York Acad. Sci., VIII. lvi. 103.

termitary (tėr′mi-tạ-ri), n.; pl. termitaries (-riz). [⟨ NL. termitarium, q.v.] A termitarium. H. A. Nicholson. ★ termite (tėr′mīt), n. [⟨ NL. Termes (Termit-), a white ant, ⟨ LL. termes (termit-), ⟨ L. tarmes (tarmit-), a wood-worm, prob. ⟨ terere, rub: see trite.] A white ant; any member of the Termitidæ.

Termitidæ (tėr-mit′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Westwood, 1839), ⟨ Termes (Termit-) + -idæ.] A family of insects; the white ants, constituting the sole family of the order Isoptera; formerly, according to Brauer, placed in the order Corrodentia. The termite form is an old one, geologically speaking, occurring in the coal-measures of Europe. At the present day, although mainly tropical, species are found in most temperate regions. Each exists in several forms. Besides the winged male and female (the latter losing her wings after impregnation), there are curiously modified sexless forms known as soldiers and workers, the former possessing large square heads and long jaws, the latter heads of moderate size and small jaws. The true impregnated females grow to an enormous size and lay many thousands of eggs. Great damage is done by these insects in tropical countries to buildings, furniture, and household stores. See cut under Termes.

termitine (tėr'mi-tin), a. and n. [< termite + -ine[1].] I. a. Resembling or related to white ants; belonging to the Termitidæ.

II. n. A white ant; a termite.

termitophile (tėr'mi-tō-fil), n. [< NL. termitophilus*: see termitophilous.] An insect which lives in the nests of white ants. Insects of several orders are found in those nests, notably members of the rove-beetle genus Philotermes.

termitophilous (tėr-mi-tof'i-lus), a. [< NL. termitophilus*, < termes (termit-), termite, + Gr. φιλεῖν, love.] Fond of termites: noting insects which live in the nests of white ants. E. A. Schwarz, Proc. Entom. Soc., Washington, I. 160.

termless (tėrm'les), a. [< term + -less.] 1. Having no term or end; unlimited; boundless; endless; limitless.

> Ne hath their day, ne hath their blisse, an end,
> But there their termelesse time in pleasure spend.
> Spenser, Hymn of Heavenly Love, l. 75.

2. Nameless; inexpressible; indescribable. [Rare.]

> His phœnix down began but to appear > Like unshorn velvet on that termless skin.
> Shak., Lover's Complaint, l. 94.

termly (tėrm'li), a. [< term + -ly[1].] Occurring, paid, etc., every term.

> The clerks are partly rewarded by that mean also [petty fees], . . . besides that termly fee which they are allowed.
> Bacon, Office of Alienations.

termly (tėrm'li), adv. [< term + -ly[2].] Term by term; every term.

> The fees, or allowances, that are termly given to these deputies, receiver, and clerks, for recompence of these their pains, I do purposely pretermit.
> Bacon, Office of Alienations.

> If there was any particular thing in the business of the house which you disliked, . . . I would . . . put it in order for you termly, or weekly, or daily. Scott, Rob Roy, ii.

termor (tėr'mor), n. [< term + -or[1].] In law, one who has an estate for a term of years or for life. Also termer.

term-piece (tėrm'pēs), n. Same as term, 5.

termyson†, n. Termination. Piers Plowman (C), iv. 409.

tern[1] (tėrn), n. [Also tarn; < Dan. terne = Sw. tärna = Icel. therna, a tern. Some connect tern[1] with ME. tarne, therne, girl, maid-servant, G. dirne, etc. (see therne); but the connection is not obvious.] A bird of the family Laridæ and subfamily Sterninæ; a stern or sea-swallow. Terns differ from gulls in their smaller average size (though a few of them are much larger than some gulls), slenderer body, usually long and deeply forked tail, very small feet, and especially in the relatively longer and slenderer bill, which is paragnathous instead of hypognathous (but some of the stouter terns, as the gull-billed, are little different in this respect from some of the smaller gulls, as of the genus Chroicocephalus). To the slender form of the body, with sharp-pointed wings and forficate tail, conferring a buoyant and dashing flight, the terns owe their name sea-swallow. The characteristic coloration is snow-white, sometimes rose-tinted, with pearly-blue mantle, silver-black primaries, jet-black cap, and coral-red, yellow, or black bill and feet; some terns (the noddies) are sooty-brown. A few are chiefly black (genus Hydrochelidon); some have a black mantle (Sterna fuliginosa, the sooty tern, type of the subgenus Haliplana); the genus Gygis is pure-white; and Inca is slaty-black, with curly white plumes on the head. Several species abound in most countries, both inland over large bodies of water and coastwise, and some of them are almost cosmopolitan in their range. The sexes are alike in color, but the changes of plumage with age and season are considerable. The eggs, two or three in number, and heavily spotted, are laid on the ground (rarely in a frail nest on bushes), generally on the shingle of the sea-shore, sometimes in a tussock of grass in marshes. Most terns congregate in large numbers during the breeding-season. (See egg-bird.) The voice is peculiarly shrill and querulous; the food is small fishes and other aquatic animals, procured by dashing down into the water on the wing. From 50 to 75 species are recognized by different ornithologists, mostly belonging to the genus Sterna or its subdivisions. See phrases below.—Aleutian tern, Sterna aleutica, a tern white with very dark pearl-gray upper parts, a white crescent in the black cap, and black bill. It resembles the sooty terns.—Arctic tern, Sterna paradisea, or S. arctica, or S. macrura, a tern with extremely long and deeply forked tail, very small coral- or lake-red feet, lake- or carmine-red bill, rather dark pearl-blue plumage, little paler below than above, and black cap. It is from 14 to 17 inches long according to the varying development of the filamentous lateral tail-feathers, and about 30 in extent of wings. This tern chiefly inhabits arctic and cold temperate parts of both hemispheres. Its synonymy is intricate, owing to confusion of names with the common and roseate terns, and the description of its varying plumages under specific designations.—Black tern, any tern of the genus Hydrochelidon; specifically, H. fissipes or lariformis. The white-winged black tern is H. leucoptera. The whiskered black tern is H. leucoparia. There are others. These are marsh-terns of most parts of the world, with semipalmate feet, comparatively short and little-forked tail, extremely ample as well as long wings, black bill, dark feet, and most of the plumage of the adults black or of some dark ashy shade.—Boys's tern, the Sandwich tern, one of whose former names was Sterna boysi, after Dr. Boys of Kent, England.—Bridled tern, Sterna (Haliplana) anæsthetica, a member of the sooty tern group, found in some of the warmer parts of the world. The frontal lunule is very long, the feet are scarcely more than semipalmate, and the length is 14 or 15 inches.—Cabot's tern, the American Sandwich tern, which Dr. Cabot once named Sterna acuflavida.—Caspian tern, Sterna (Thalasseus) caspia; the imperial tern. It is the largest tern known, being from 20 to 23 inches long, and 4 to 4½ feet in spread of wings; it is white, with pearl mantle, black cap and feet, and red bill. It is widely distributed in Asia, America, and elsewhere. The name S. tschegrava was given to it by Lepechin, before Pallas named it caspia.—Cayenne tern, Sterna (Thalasseus) maxima, formerly S. cayennensis or cayana, the largest tern of America except the imperial, 18 or 20 inches long, and from 42 to 44 in extent. It is white, with pearl mantle, black cap and feet, and coral or yellow bill. It inhabits much of both Americas, and is common along the Atlantic coast of the United States. See cut under Thalasseus.—Common tern, Sterna hirundo, a bird of most parts of the world, about 14½ inches long, 31 in extent, and with pearly-white under parts, pearl mantle, black cap, coral feet, and vermilion black-tipped bill. It is needlessly named Wilson's tern. Also called gull-teaser, kirr-mew, picket, picktarny, pirr, rippock, rittock, scray, spurre, tarny, tarret, tarrock. See cut under Sterna.—Ducal tern, the Sandwich tern. Coues, 1884.—Elegant tern, Sterna (Thalasseus) elegans, a bird of South and Central America and the Pacific coast of the United States, resembling the Cayenne tern. W. Gambel.—Emperor tern. See emperor.—Fairy tern, a fairy-bird; one of the least terns.—Forster's tern, Sterna forsteri, an American tern abounding in the United States and British America. It closely resembles but is distinct from the common tern, as was first noted in 1834 by Thomas Nuttall, who dedicated it to John Reinhold Forster.—Greater tern, the common tern.—Gull-billed tern, a marsh-tern, Sterna (Gelochelidon) anglica: so called from its thick bill. See cut under Gelochelidon.—Havell's tern, Forster's tern in immature plumage. Audubon, 1839.—Hooded tern, a rare name of the least tern.—Imperial tern, the American Caspian tern, Sterna (Thalasseus) imperator. Coues, 1862.—Kentish tern, the Sandwich tern.—Least terns, the small terns which constitute the subgenus Sternula, of several species. That of Europe is S. minuta; of America, S. antillarum; of South Africa, S. balænarum, etc. They are the smallest of the family, of the usual coloration, but with a white crescent in the black cap, yellow bill tipped with black, and yellow or orange feet; the tail is not deeply forked; the length is 9 inches or less. See cut under Sternula.—Marsh-tern, (a) The gull-billed tern. (b) A black tern; any member of the genus Hydrochelidon. See cut under Hydrochelidon.—Noddy tern. See noddy[1], 2, and Anoüs.—Panay tern†, an old name of the bridled tern, considered a distinct species under the name Sterna panayensis. Latham, 1785.—Paradise tern, the roseate tern: a name derived from Sterna paradisea of Brünnich, 1764, which is of doubtful identification, and probably means the arctic tern.—Portland tern, a young arctic tern: named from the city of Portland in Maine. R. Ridgway, 1874.—Princely tern, the elegant tern. Coues, 1884.—Roseate tern. See roseate.—Royal tern, the Cayenne tern. W. Gambel.—Sandwich tern Sterna (Thalasseus) cantiaca, a tern originally described from Kent, England, and in some of its forms found in most parts of the world. It has many technical names. The American form has been distinguished as S. acuflavida. This is one of the smallest of the large terns (section Thalasseus), and has a long and slender black bill tipped with yellow, black feet and cap, pearl mantle, and the general plumage white, as usual. It is 15 or 16 inches long.—Sea-tern, a name of several terns, especially of the large species of the section Thalasseus, which are mainly maritime.—Short-tailed tern. See short-tailed.—Sooty tern. See sooty.—Surinam tern, an old name of the common black short-tailed tern of North America, Hydrochelidon fissipes, called H. fissipes surinamensis when it is subspecifically distinguished from its European conspecies H. fissipes.—Trudeau's tern, S. trudeaui, a South American tern supposed by Audubon (1839) to occur also in the United States. It is of about the size of the common tern, of a pearly-bluish color all over, whitening on the head, and with a yellow or orange bill.—Whiskered tern, Hydrochelidon leucoparia (after Natterer in Temminck's "Manual," 1820), one of the black terns, with a large white stripe on each side of the head.—Wilson's tern. See common tern.

tern[2] (tėrn), a. and n. [= F. terne, a three (in dice), three numbers (in a lottery), = Pr. terna = Sp. terna, terno = Pg. It. terno, n., a set of three, < L. ternus, pl. terni, three each, < tres, three (ter, thrice): see three.] I. a. Same as ternate.

II. n. 1. That which consists of three things or numbers together; specifically, a prize in a lottery gained by drawing three favorable numbers, or the three numbers so drawn.

> She'd win a tern in Thursday's lottery.
> Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, vii.

2. In math., a system of three pairs of conjugate trihedra which together contain the twenty-seven straight lines lying in a cubic surface.

tern[3] (tėrn), n. [Origin uncertain.] A three-masted schooner; a three-master. [Local, New Eng.]

ternal (tėr'nal), a. [< ML. ternalis (used as a noun), < L. terni, by threes: see tern[2].] Consisting of three each; threefold.—Ternal proposition. See proposition.

ternary (tėr'na-ri), a. and n. [= F. ternaire = Pr. ternari = Sp. Pg. It. ternario, < LL. ternarius, consisting of threes, < L. terni, by threes: see tern[2].] I. a. Proceeding by threes; consisting of three: as, a ternary flower (that is, one having three members in each cycle); a ternary chemical substance (that is, one composed of three elements).—Ternary compounds, in old chem., combinations of binary compounds with each other, as of sulphuric acid with soda in Glauber's salt.—Ternary cubic. See cubic.—Ternary form, in music. Same as rondo form (which see, under rondo).—Ternary measure or time, in music. Same as triple rhythm (which see, under rhythm, 2 (b)).—Ternary quadrics. See quadric.

II. n.; pl. ternaries (-riz). The number three; a group of three.

> Of the second ternary of stanzas [in "The Progress of Poetry"], the first endeavours to tell something.
> Johnson, Gray.

Ternatan (tėr-nā'tan), a. [< Ternate (see def.) + -an.] Of or pertaining to Ternate, an island, town, and Dutch possession in the East Indies: specifically noting a kingfisher of the genus Tanysiptera.

ternate (tėr'nāt), a. [< NL. ternatus, arranged in threes, < L. terni, by threes: see tern[2].] Arranged in threes; characterized by an arrangement of parts by threes; in bot., used especially of a compound leaf with three leaflets, or of leaves whorled in threes. If the three divisions of a ternate leaf are subdivided into three leaflets each, the leaf is biternate, and a still further subdivision produces a triternate leaf. See also cut of Thalictrum, under leaf.

ternately (tėr'nāt-li), adv. In a ternate manner; so as to form groups of three.

ternatisect (tėr-nat'i-sekt), a. [< NL. ternatus, in threes, + L. secare, pp. sectus, cut.] In bot., cut into three lobes or partial divisions.

ternatopinnate (tėr-nā-tō-pin'āt), a. [< NL. ternatus, in threes, + L. pinnatus, feathered: see pinnate.] In bot., noting a compound leaf with three pinnate divisions.

terne[1]†, n. A Middle English form of tarn[1].

terne[2] (tėrn), n. [Short for terne-plate.] Same as terne-plate.

terne-plate (tėrn'plāt), n. [< F. terne, dull, + E. plate.] An inferior kind of tin-plate, in making which the tin used is alloyed with a large percentage of lead. It is chiefly used for roofing, and for lining packing-cases to protect valuable goods from damage in transportation by sea.

ternery (tėr'nėr-i), n.; pl. terneries (-iz). [< tern[1] + -ery.] A place where terns or sea-swallows breed in large numbers.

ternion (tėr'ni-on), n. [< LL. ternio(n-), the number three, < L. terni, by threes: see tern[2].] 1†. A group of three.

> So, when Christ's Glory Isay would declare,
> To expresse Three Persons in on Godhead are,
> He, Holy, Holy, Holy nam'd, To show
> We might a Ternion in an Vnion know.

Ternstrœmia (tėrn-strē'mi-ä), n. [NL., named after the Swedish naturalist Christopher Ternström.] A name given by Mutis in 1781 to Taonabo, a genus of dicotyledonous plants, of the family Theaceæ. It is characterized by bracted flowers with free sepals, imbricated petals united at the base, smooth basifixed anthers, and a superior ovary with an undivided style and two to three cells each usually with two ovules pendulous from the apex. The fruit is indehiscent, its seeds large and hippocrepiform, with fleshy albumen and an inflexed embryo. There are about twenty-eight species, mostly of tropical America, with five or six in warm parts of Asia and the Indian archipelago. They are evergreen trees and shrubs, with coriaceous leaves and recurved lateral peduncles which are solitary or clustered and bear each a single rather large flower with numerous stamens. Taonabo obovalis (Ternstrœmia obovalis of Richard) is known in the West Indies as scarletseed, and other species as ironwood.

Ternstrœmiaceæ (tėrn-strē-mi-ā'sē-ē), n. pl.

[NL., < Ternstrœmia + -aceæ.] The name given by Robert Brown in 1818 to the plant family Theaceæ, based on Ternstrœmia of Mutis, which being antedated by Taonabo becomes a synonym and invalidates the family name. The family Theaceæ, or tea family, belongs to the order Hypericales, and embraces 18 genera divided into 5 tribes, and about 200 species, natives of the tropics, especially in America, Asia, and the Indian archipelago, and sometimes extending northward in eastern Asia and America. They are trees or shrubs, rarely climbers, with feather-veined leaves which are entire or more often serrate. The regular, usually 5-merous flowers are often large and handsome, the fruit fleshy, coriaceous, or woody, or very often a capsule with a persistent central columella. The seeds are borne on a placenta which is frequently prominent and fleshy or spongy, usually with a curved, bent, hippocrepiform, or spiral embryo. The principal genera are Thea, Taonabo, Lasianthus, Stewartia, and Kieseria.

Ternstrœmieæ (tėrn-strē-mī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Mirbel, 1813), < Ternstrœmia + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Theaceæ. As the genus name on which that of the tribe is based is a synonym of Taonabo the proper name of the tribe is Taonabeæ, given it by Szyszylowicz in 1893.

terpene (tėr′pēn), n. [A modified form of terebene.] A name given to the members of a class of hydrocarbons having the empirical composition C_5H_8. They are classified as hemiterpenes, C_5H_8, terpenes proper, $C_{10}H_{16}$, sesquiterpenes, $C_{15}H_{24}$, and polyterpenes, $(C_5H_8)_x$. With their closely related derivatives the terpenes make up the larger part of most essential oils.

terpentine†, n. An obsolete form of turpentine.

terpodion (tėr-pō′di-ọn), n. [< Gr. τέρπειν, delight, + ᾠδή, a song: see ode[1].] A musical instrument invented by J. D. Buschmann in 1816, the tones of which were produced by friction from blocks of wood. It was played by means of a keyboard.

Terpsichore (tėrp-sik′ō-rē), n. [< L. Terpsichore, < Gr. Τερψιχόρη (Attic Τερψιχόρα), Terpsichore, fem. of τερψίχορος, delighting in the dance, < τέρπειν, fut. τέρψειν, enjoy, delight in, + χορός, dance, dancing: see chorus.] In classical myth., one of the Muses, the especial companion of Melpomene, and the patroness of the choral dance and of the dramatic chorus developed from it. In the last days of the Greek religion her attributions became restricted chiefly to the province of lyric poetry. In art this Muse is represented as a graceful figure clad in flowing draperies, often seated, and usually bearing a lyre. Her type is closely akin to that of Erato, but the latter is always shown standing.

Terpsichorean (tėrp″si-kō-rē′ạn), a. and n. [< Terpsichore + -an.] I. a. [cap. or l. c.] Relating to the Muse Terpsichore, or to dancing and lyrical poetry, which were sacred to this Muse: as, the terpsichorean art (that is, dancing).

II. n. [l. c.] A dancer. [Colloq.]

Terpsiphone (tėrp-si-fō′nē), n. [NL. (C. W. L. Gloger, 1827), < Gr. τέρψις, enjoyment, delight, + φωνή, voice.] A genus of Old World Muscicapidæ. The leading species is the celebrated paradise flycatcher, T. paradisea, remarkable for the singular development of the tail. This bird was originally figured and described more than a century ago by Edwards, who called it the pied bird of paradise. It was long mistaken for a bird of Africa, as by Levaillant, who figured it under the name Paradise Flycatcher (Terpsiphone paradisea), male; female in background.

tchitrec-bé (the original of Lesson's genus Tchitrea); it has also been placed in the larger genera Muscicapa, Muscipeta, and Muscivora of the early writers of the present century. It is native of India and Ceylon. The adult male is chiefly pure-white and black, with glossy steel-green head, throat, and crest; the bill is blue, the mouth is yellow, and the eyes are brown. The total length is about 17 inches, of which 12 or 13 inches belong to the two middle tail-feathers, the tail with this exception being 5½ inches, the wing less than 4 inches. The female is quite different, only 7½ inches long, without any peculiarity of the tail, and with plain rufous-brown, gray, and white colors, the crest, however, being glossy greenish-black. A similar species of the Indian archipelago is T. affinis. T. mutata belongs to Madagascar; and there are about a dozen other species of this beautiful and varied genus, whose members are found from Madagascar across Africa and India to China, Japan, the Malay peninsula, Java, Sumatra, Borneo, and Flores.

terpuck (tėr′puk), n. [< Russ. terpukĭ, lit. a rasp; so called on account of the roughness of the scales.] A fish of the family Hexagrammidæ, as Hexagrammus lagocephalus and H. octogrammus. Sir John Richardson.

terra (ter′ạ), n. [= F. terre = Sp. tierra = Pg. It. terra, < L. terra, earth, land, ground, soil; orig. tersa*, 'dry land,' akin to torrere, dry, or parch with heat, Gr. τέρσεσθαι, become dry: see thirst, and cf. torrent.] Earth, or the earth: sometimes personified, Terra: used especially in various phrases (Latin and Italian).—Terra alba ('white earth'), pipe-clay.—Terra a terra†. [= F. terre à terre = Sp. tierra a tierra = It. terra a terra, close to the ground, lit. 'ground to ground.'] An artificial gait formerly taught horses in the manège or riding-school. It was a short, half-prancing, half-leaping gait, the horse lifting himself alternately upon the fore and hind feet, and going somewhat sidewise. It differed from curvets chiefly in that the horse did not step so high. It is much noticed in the horse-market literature of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

> I rid first a Spanish Horse, a light Bay, called Le Superbe, a beautiful horse. . . . He went in corvets forwards, backwards, sideways, . . . and went Terra a Terra Perfectly. The second Horse I Rid was another Spanish Horse, . . . a Brown-Bay with a White star in his Forehead; no Horse ever went Terra a Terra like him, so just, and so easie; and for the Pirouette, etc.

The former, which is very useful in landscape-painting in oil, is a silicious earth colored by the protoxid of iron, of which it contains about 20 per cent. Also terre verte.

terrace[1] (ter′ās), n. [Early mod. E. also terras, tarras, tarrasse; < OF. terrace, terrasse, a terrace, gallery, F. terrasse, < It. terraccia, terrazzo, a terrace, < terra, < L. terra, earth, land: see terra.] 1. A raised level faced with masonry or turf; an elevated flat space: as, a garden terrace; also, a natural formation of the ground resembling such a terrace.

2. In geol., a strip of land, nearly level, extending along the margin of the sea, a lake, or a river, and terminating on the side toward the water in a more or less abrupt descent; a beach; a raised beach. Also called in Scotland a carse, and in parts of the United States where Spanish was formerly spoken a mesa, or meseta. Terraces are seen in many parts of the world, and vary greatly in width, height, and longitudinal extent, as well as in the mode of their formation. Marine terraces, or raised beaches, have usually been caused by the elevation of the land, the preëxisting beach having been thus lifted above the action of the water, and a new one formed at a lower level. Raised beaches, terraces, or ancient sea-margins of this kind form conspicuous features in the coast topography of various regions, as of Scandinavia, Scotland, and the Pacific coast of North and South America. Some river- and lake-terraces may have been formed by the upheaval of the region where they occur; but a far more important and general cause of their existence is the diminution of the amount of water flowing in the rivers or standing in the lakes—a phenomenon of which there are abundant proofs all over the world, and the beginning of which reaches back certainly into Tertiary times, but how much further is not definitely known, since the geological records of such change of climate could not be preserved for an indefinite period, and very little is known in regard to the position of rivers, or bodies of water distinctly separated from the ocean, at any remote geological period. Rarely called a bench.

terra-cotta (ter′ạ-kot′ạ), n. [= F. terre cuite, < It. terra cotta, < L. terra cocta, lit. baked earth: terra, earth; cocta, fem. of coctus, pp. of coquere, cook, bake: see coct, cook[1].] 1. A hard pottery made for use as a building-material and for similar purposes, of much finer quality and harder baked than brick; in the usual acceptation of the term, all unglazed pottery, or any article made of such pottery. It differs in color according to the ingredients employed. The color is usually the same throughout the paste; but terra-cotta is made also with an enameled surface, and even with a surface specially colored without enamel. Earthenware similar to this, but from materials chosen and prepared with special care, is made in the form of artistic works, as bas-reliefs, statuettes, etc.

2. A work in terra-cotta, especially a work of art: specifically applied to small figures (statuettes) or figurines in this material, which have held an important place in art both in ancient and in modern times, and are of peculiar interest in the study of Greek art, which is presented by them in a more popular and familiar light than is possible with works of greater pretensions. See Tanagra figurine (under figurine), and see also cut under Etruscan.—3. A brownish-orange color like that of much terra-cotta.

terracultural (ter-ạ-kul′tūr-ạl), a. [< terraculture + -al.] Of or pertaining to terraculture; agricultural. [Rare.]

terraculture (ter′ạ-kul-tūr), n. [Irreg. < L. terra, earth, + cultura, culture.] Cultivation of the earth; agriculture. [Rare.]

terræ filius (ter′ē fil′i-us). [L.: terræ, gen. of terra, earth; filius, son.] 1. A person of obscure birth or of low origin.—2†. A scholar at the University of Oxford appointed to make jesting satirical speeches. He often indulged in considerable license in his treatment of the authorities of the university.

The assembly now return'd to the Theater, where the Terræ filius (the Universitie Buffoone) entertain'd the auditorie with a tedious, abusive, sarcastical rhapsodie, most unbecoming the gravity of the Universitie.
Evelyn, Diary, July 10, 1669.

terrage[1] (ter'āj), n. [< F. terre (< L. terra), earth, + -age. Cf. terage.] A mound of earth, especially a small one, as in a flower-pot, in which plants can be set for household decoration.

terrage[2] (ter'āj), n. [Also terriage; < OF. terrage, field-rent, < terre, land: see terra.] In old Eng. law, an exaction or fee paid to the owner of the land for some license, privilege, or exemption, such, for instance, as leave to dig or break the earth for a grave, or in setting up a market or fair, or for freedom from service in tillage, or for being allowed an additional holding, etc.

terrain (te-rān'), n. [Also sometimes terrane; < F. terrain, terrein, ground, a piece of ground, soil, rock, = It. terreno, < L. terrenum, land, ground, prop. neut. of terrenus, consisting of earth, < terra, earth: see terra, terrene.] A part of the earth's surface limited in extent; a region, district, or tract of land, either looked at in a general way or considered with reference to its fitness or use for some special purpose, as for a building-place or a battle-field: a term little used in English except in translating from the French, and then with the same meaning which it has in the original. The word is, however, also used in various idiomatic expressions, in translating a number of which the English word "ground" is most properly employed: as, "gagner du terrain," to gain ground; "perdre du terrain," to lose ground, favor, or credit; also with various metaphorical significations: as, "être sur son terrain," to have to do with, or to speak of, that with which one is thoroughly familiar; "sonder le terrain," examine the conditions, or look into the matter, etc. As used by French geologists, the word terrain has a somewhat vague meaning, and is usually limited by some qualifying term: as, "terrain de transition," "terrain primitif." This word was introduced into English geological literature by the translator of Humboldt's "Essai Géognostique," where it was used, as he remarks, "because we have no word in the English language which will accurately express terrain as used in geology by the French." Also spelled (but rarely) terrane.

Rocks which alternate with each other, and which are found usually together, and which display the same relations of position, constitute the same formation; the union of several formations constitutes a geological series or a district (terrain); but the terms rocks, formations, and terrains are used as synonymous in many works on geognosy.
Humboldt, Geognostical Essay on the Superposition of [Rocks (trans.), p. 2.

This term [terrane] is used for any single rock or continuous series of rocks of a region, whether the formation be stratified or not. It is applied especially to metamorphic and igneous rocks, as a basaltic terrane, etc.
J. D. Dana, Man. of Geol. (rev. ed.), p. 81.

terramara (ter-à-mä'r¨), n.; pl. terramare (-re). [< It. terra amara, bitter earth (a term used in the vicinity of Parma): terra, < L. terra, earth; amara, fem. of amaro, < L. amarus, bitter.] Any stratum or deposit of earthy material containing organic or mineral matter (such as bones or phosphates) in sufficient quantity to furnish a valuable fertilizer; hence, a deposit containing prehistoric remains, as fragments of bones and pottery, cinders, etc., of similar character to the deposits called in northern Europe kitchen-middens. There are large numbers of these terramare on the plain traversed by the Via Emilia between the Po and the Apennines; some of them are intermediate in character between the kitchen-middens of Denmark and the palafittes of Switzerland, appearing to mark sites of settlements originally built on piles in shallow lakes (or perhaps on marshy ground subject to frequent inundation), which have gradually become desiccated while the stations continued to be occupied.

terrane, n. See terrain.

terranean (te-rā'nē-an), a. [< L. terra, earth, + -an + -e-an (after subterranean, mediterranean, etc.).] Being in the earth; belonging to the earth, or occurring beneath the surface of the earth.

The great strain on the trolley wire which would be a necessary incident of terranean supply renders such a system impracticable. Elect. Rev. (Amer.), XVIII. i. 9.

terraneous (te-rā'nē-us), a. [< L. terra, earth, + -ax + -e-ous (after subterraneous).] In bot., growing on land.

terrapene†, n. An obsolete variant of terrapin.

Terrapenes (ter-a-pē'nēz), n. pl. [NL.: see terrapin.] A subdivision of Emydea (which see), in which the pelvis is free, the neck bends in a vertical plane, and the head may be almost completely retracted within the carapace.
Huxley. The group contains such genera as Emys, Cistudo, Chelydra, Cinosternum, and Staurotypus. The other subdivision of Emydea is Chelodines. See cuts under Cinosternum, Cistudo, and terrapin.

terrapin (ter'a-pin), n. [Formerly also terapin, terrapene, turpin; cf. Abenaki turebe (Rasles).]

1. One of several different fresh-water or tide-water tortoises of the family Emydidæ; specifically, in the United States, the diamond-back, Malaclemmys or Malacoclemmys concentrica, of the Atlantic coast from New Diamond-backed Terrapin (Malaclemmys concentrica).

York to Texas, famous among epicures. See diamond-backed turtle (under diamond-backed), and Malaclemmys. In trade use the sexes are distinguished as bull and cow, and small ones as little bulls and heifers respectively. Those under 5 or 6 inches in total length of the under shell are termed cullings, of which it takes from 18 to 24 or more to make a "dozen." Those of 6 inches and more are counts or counters, of 12 to the dozen. Only the cows reach 6½ to 7 inches in this measurement; these are known to dealers as full counts, and are especially valuable because they usually contain eggs; the bulls are tougher as well as smaller, and of less market value.

2. Some other tortoise or turtle: as, the elephant terrapin of the Galapagos.—3. A dish made of the diamond-back.

Terrapin is essentially a Philadelphia dish. Baltimore delights in it, Washington eats it, New York knows it, but in Philadelphia it approaches a crime not to be passionately fond of it. J. W. Forney, The Epicure.

terrapin-farm (ter'a-pin-färm), n. A place where the diamond-back is cultivated.

terrapin-paws (ter'a-pin-pâz), n. sing. and pl. A pair of long-handled tongs used in catching terrapin. [Chesapeake Bay.]

terraquean (te-rā'kwē-an), a. [< terraque-ous + -an.] Terraqueous. [Rare.]

This terraquean globe. Macmillan's Mag., III. 471.

terraqueous (te-rā'kwē-us), a. [< L. terra, earth, + aqua, water (see aqueous).] Consisting of land and water, as the globe or earth.

I find but one thing that may give any just offence, and that is the Hypothesis of the Terraqueous globe, wherewith I must confesse my self not to be satisfied.
Ray, in Letters of Eminent Men, II. 159.

terrar†, n. Same as terrier[2].

terrarium (te-rā'ri-um), n.; pl. terrariums, terraria (-umz, -ä). [< L. terra, earth: a word modeled on aquarium.] A vivarium for land animals; a place where such animals are kept alive for study or observation.

terre[1]†, v. t. Same as tar[2].

terre[2]†, v. t. [< F. terrer, < terre, earth: see terra. Cf. inter, atter.] To strike to the earth.

"Loe, heere my gage" (he terr'd his gloue);
"Thou know'st the victor's meed."
Warner, Albion's England, iii. 128.

terreen†, (te-rēn'), n. See tureen.

terreity† (te-rē'i-ti), n. [< L. terra + -e-ity.] Earthiness. [Rare.]

The aqueity,
Terreity, and sulphureity
Shall run together again, and all be annull'd.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

terrel† (ter'el), n. [Also terrella, terella; < NL. terrella, dim. of L. terra, earth: see terra.] A spherical figure so placed that its poles, equator, etc., correspond exactly to those of the earth, for showing magnetic deviations, etc.

terrella† (te-rel'ä), n. Same as terrel.

I was shew'd a pretty Terrella, describ'd with all ye circles, and shewing all ye magnetic deviations.
Evelyn, Diary, July 3, 1655.

Terrell grass. A species of wild rye, or lyme-grass, Elymus Virginicus, a coarse grass, but found useful for forage in the southern United States: so named from a promoter of its use.

terremote† (ter'e-mōt), n. [ME., < OF. terremote, < ML. terræ motus, earthquake: L. terræ, gen. of terra, earth; motus, movement, < movere, pp. motus, move: see motion.] An earthquake.

All the halle quoke,
As it a terremote were. Gower, Conf. Amant., vi.

terremotive (ter-e-mō'tiv), a. [< terremote + -ive.] Of, pertaining to, characterized by, or causing motion of the earth's surface; seismic. [Rare.]

We may mark our cycles by the greatest known paroxysms of volcanic and terremotive agency.
Whewell, Philos. of Inductive Sciences, X. iii. § 4.

terrene[1] (te-rēn'), a. and n. [= Sp. Pg. It. terreno, < L. terrenus, of, pertaining to, or consisting of earth (neut. terrenum, land, ground: see terrain), < terra, earth, land: see terra.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the earth; earthly; terrestrial: as, terrene substance.

I would teach him . . . that Mammonism was, not the essence of his or of my station in God's Universe, but the adscititious excrescence of it; the gross, terrene, godless embodiment of it. Carlyle.

II. n. 1. The earth. [Rare.]

Over many a tract
Of heaven they march'd, and many a province wide, Tenfold the length of this terrene. Milton, P. L., vi. 78.

2. The surface of the earth. [Recent.]

terrene[2]†, n. See terrine, tureen.

terrenely†, adv. [ME. terrenly; < terrene[1] + -ly[2].] As regards lands.

I Hym make my proper enheritour,
For yut shall he be wurthy terrenly.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 5014.

terrenity (te-ren'i-ti), n. [< terrene[1] + -ity.] The state or character of being terrene; worldliness.

Being overcome . . . debases all the spirits to a dull and low terrenity. Feltham, Resolves.

terreous† (ter'ē-us), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. terreo, < L. terreus, earthen, < terra, earth: see terra. Cf. terrosity.] Earthy; consisting of earth.

According to the temper of the terreous parts at the bottom, variously begin intumescencies Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

terre-plein (târ'plān), n. [F., < terre, earth, + plein for plain, level, flat: see terra and plain[1].] 1. In fort., the top, platform, or horizontal surface of a rampart, on which the cannon are placed.—2. The plane of site or level surface around a field-work.

terrestre†, a. [ME., < OF. (and F.) terrestre = Pr. Sp. Pg. It. terrestre, < L. terrestris, of or belonging to the earth, < terra, earth: see terra. Cf. terrestrial.] Terrestrial; earthly.

Heere may ye se, and heerby may ye preve,
That wyf is mannes helpe and his confort,
His Paradys terrestre, and his disport.
Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 88.

terrestreity (ter-es-trē'i-ti), n. Admixture of earth.

Sulphur itself . . . is not quite devoid of terrestreity.
Boyle, Mechanical Hypotheses.

Terrestres (te-res'trēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. terrestris, of or belonging to the earth: see terrestre, terrestrial.] In ornith., one of three series into which birds were formerly divided, containing the rasorial and cursorial forms: contrasted with Aëreæ and Aquaticæ: more fully called Aves terrestres.

terrestrial (te-res'tri-al), a. and n. [< ME. terrestriall, < OF. terrestrial, < L. terrestris, of or belonging to the earth (see terrestre), + -al.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the earth; existing on the earth; earthly: opposed to celestial: as, terrestrial bodies; terrestrial magnetism.

Vnto mortall deth me to haue ye shold,
Ryght as a woman born here naturall,
A feminine thyng. woman at al houres,
To end of my days here terrestriall.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 3622.

There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial.
1 Cor. xv. 40.

2. Representing or consisting of the earth: as, a or the terrestrial globe. See globe, 4.

What though, in solemn silence, all Move round this dark, terrestrial ball?
Addison, Ode, The Spacious Firmament.

3. Pertaining to the world or to the present state; sublunary; worldly; mundane.

A genius bright and base,
Of tow'ring talents and terrestrial aims.
Young, Night Thoughts, vi.

4. Pertaining to or consisting of land, as opposed to water, or of earth.

The terrestrial substance, destitute of all liquor, remaineth alone. Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 598.

I did not confine these observations to land, or terrestrial parts of the globe, but extended them to the fluids. Woodward.

5. In zoöl., living on the ground; confined to the ground; not aquatic, arboreal, or aërial; terricolous. Specifically—(a) In ornith., rasorial or cursorial; belonging to the Terrestres. (b) In conch., air-breathing or pulmonate, as a snail or a slug. (c) Belonging to that division of isopods which contains the woodlice, sow-bugs, or land-slaters.

6. In bot., growing on land, not aquatic; growing in the ground, not on trees.—Terrestrial gravitation, magnetism, radiation, refraction, telescope. See the nouns.—Terrestrial-radiation thermometer. See thermometer.

II. n. 1. An inhabitant of the earth.

But Heav'n, that knows what all terrestrials need,
Repose to night, and toil to day decreed.
Fenton, in Pope's Odyssey, xix. 682.

2. pl. In zoöl.: (a) A section of the class Aves, the Terrestres. (b) The pulmonate gastropods. (c) A division of isopods.

terrestrially (te-res'tri-ạl-i), adv. 1. After a terrestrial or earthly manner.—2. In zoöl., in or on the ground; on land, not in water: as, to pupate terrestrially, as an insect.

terrestrialness (te-res'tri-ạl-nes), n. The state or character of being terrestrial. Imp. Dict.

terrestrify† (te-res'tri-fī), v. t. [< L. terrestris, of the earth, + facere, make (see -fy).] To reduce to earth, or to an earthly or mundane state.

Though we should affirm . . . that heaven were but earth celestified, and earth but heaven terrestrified.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 13.

terrestrious (te-res'tri-us), a. [< L. terrestris, of the earth (see terrestre), + -ous.] 1. Of or belonging to the earth or to land; terrestrial.

The reason of Kircherus may be added—that this variation proceedeth, not only from terrestrious eminences and magnetical veins of the earth, laterally respecting the needle, but from the different coagmentation of the earth disposed unto the poles, lying under the sea and waters.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 2.

The British capital is at the geographical centre of the terrestrious portion of the globe.
G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., Int., p. 24.

> But if thou linger in my territories
> Longer than swiftest expedition
> Will give thee time to leave our royal court,
> By heaven! my wrath shall far exceed the love
> I ever bore my daughter or thyself.
> Shak., T. G. of V., iii. 1. 163.

Those who live thus mewed up within their own contracted territories, and will not look abroad beyond the boundaries that chance, conceit, or laziness has set to their inquiries. Locke, Conduct of the Understanding, § 3.

Gentlemen, I thought the deck of a Massachusetts ship was as much the territory of Massachusetts as the floor on which we stand. Emerson, West Indian Emancipation.

2. Any extensive tract, region, district, or domain: as, an unexplored territory in Africa.

From hence being brought to a subterranean territorie of cellars, the courteous friars made us taste a variety of excellent wines. Evelyn, Diary, May 21, 1645.

3. [cap.] In the United States, an organized division of the country, not admitted to the complete rights of Statehood (see state, 13). Its government is conducted by a governor, judges, and other officers appointed from Washington, aided by a Territorial legislature. Each Territory sends one delegate to Congress, who has a voice on Territorial matters, but cannot vote. Territories are formed by act of Congress. When a Territory has sufficient population to entitle it to one representative in the National House of Representatives, it is usually admitted by act of Congress to the Union as a State. Nearly all the States (except the original thirteen) have passed through the Territorial condition. There are now two Territories, Hawaii and Alaska. A legislature for Alaska was authorized by act of Congress, approved Aug. 24, 1912. Several countries of Spanish America have a system of Territories analogous to that of the United States. —Cell territory, in anat. and physiol., the range of extracellular substance supposed to be influenced by each individual cell of any tissue. Virchow.—Territory of a judge, in Scots law, the district over which a judge's jurisdiction extends in causes and in judicial acts proper to him, and beyond which he has no judicial authority. = Syn. 1 and 2. Quarter, province.

tertial (tėr′shal), a. and n. [< L. tertialis*, < tertius, third: see terce.] I. a. Of the third rank or row among the flight-feathers of a bird's wing; tertiary, as a quill-feather.

II. n. A tertiary flight-feather; one of the pennæ, or large feathers, of a bird's wing of the third set, which grow on the elbow or upper arm; one of the tertiaries. The word was intended to signify only the third set of flight-feathers, in the same relation to the humerus that the secondaries bear to the ulna, and the primaries to the manus; but in practice two or three of the innermost secondaries are called tertials when in any way distinguished from the rest. Also tertiary, tertiary feather. See cuts under bird[1] and covert, n., 6.

The two or three longer innermost true secondaries, growing upon the very elbow, are often incorrectly called tertials, especially when distinguished by size, shape, or color from the rest of the secondaries.
Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 113.

tertian (tėr′shan), a. and n. [I. a. < ME. tercian, < L. tertianus, of the third (day), < tertius, third: see terce. II. n. < ME. tercian, terciane, < OF. tertiane = Sp. terciana = Pg. terçãa, < L. tertiana (sc. febris), a tertian fever, fem. of tertianus, of the third (day): see I.] I. a. Occurring every second day: as, a tertian fever.

> If it do, I dar wel leye a grote
> That ye shul have a fevere terciane.
> Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 139.

Double tertian fever. See fever[1].—Tertian ague, intermittent fever with a paroxysm every other day.—Tertian fever. See fever[1].

II. n. 1. A fever or other disease whose paroxysms return after a period of two days, or on the third day, reckoning both days of consecutive occurrence; an intermittent whose paroxysms occur after intervals of about forty-eight hours.

By how much a hectic fever is harder to be cured than a tertian, . . . by so much is it harder to prevail upon a triumphing lust than upon its first insinuations.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 110.

2. In organ-building, a stop consisting of a tierce and a larigot combined.—3†. A measure of 84 gallons, the third part of a tun. Statute of Henry VI.—4. A curve of the third order. [Rare.]

tertiary (tėr'shi-ā-ri), a. and n. [= F. tertiaire = Sp. tercero = Pg. terceiro = It. terziario, < L. tertiarius, containing a third part, < tertius, third: see tertian.] I. a. 1. Of the third order, rank, or formation; third.—2. [Usually cap.] In geol., of, pertaining to, or occurring in the Tertiary. See II. (a).

In a word, in proportion as the age of a tertiary formation is more modern, so also is the resemblance greater of its fossil shells to the testaceous fauna of the actual seas. Lyell, Elements of Geology (1st ed., 1838), p. 283.

3. In ornith., same as tertial: distinguished from secondary and from primary. See cuts under bird[1] and covert, n., 6.—4. [cap. or l. c.] Belonging or pertaining to the Tertiaries. See II. (b).

Guido buried him [Dante] with due care in a stone urn in the burying ground of the Franciscans, who loved him, and in whose tertiary habit he was shrouded in the supreme hour. N. and Q., 7th ser., XI. 289.

Tertiary alcohol. See alcohol, 3.—Tertiary color, a color produced by the mixture of two secondary colors, as citrine, russet, or olive. See II. (c).—Tertiary feather. Same as tertial.—Tertiary syphilis. See syphilis.

II. n. One who or that which is tertiary, or third in order or succession. Specifically—(a) [cap.] In geol., that part of the series of geological formations which lies above the Mesozoic or Secondary and below the Quaternary; the "Cænozoic" of some authors, while others include in this division both Tertiary and Quaternary. The term Tertiary belongs to an early period in the history of geology, the entire series having been divided into Primary, Secondary, and Tertiary. The term transition was afterward introduced (see transition), and Quaternary still later; but the Quaternary has been considered by some as being rather a subdivision of the Tertiary, since it seems to have been of relatively short duration, and not anywhere preceded by any break to be compared in importance with that which in various regions characterizes the passage from Mesozoic to Tertiary. The Tertiary was divided by Lyell into three groups or systems, the basis of this classification being the percentage of living species of Mollusca in each group; these divisions were designated by him as the Eocene, Miocene, and Pliocene, to which a fourth was added later by Beyrich, namely the Oligocene, intercalated between the Eocene and Miocene. This scheme of subdivision is still accepted as convenient and philosophical, although strict regard is not paid to the precise percentages of living species indicated by Lyell. The subdivisions of these larger divisions which have been found necessary in different regions vary considerably in number and character. The break between the Cretaceous and the Tertiary in northwestern Europe is, on the whole, very marked in character; in various other parts of the world it is much less apparent. The more important and striking features of the Tertiary may be very concisely summed up as follows: evidence of the greatly increasing importance of the surface of the land as compared with that of the water, as shown by the local and detrital character, and the small and rapidly varying thickness, of the deposits, together with the rapidly increasing development of a land-fauna and -flora; the uplifting of the great mountain-chains of the globe, an operation performed on a gigantic scale, some parts of the early Tertiary having been raised to an elevation of nearly 20,000 feet above the sea-level; the almost entire disappearance of many of those forms of animal life which were prominent during the Mesozoic epoch, as of the cephalopods, the gigantic reptiles, and especially the development of the Mammalia in ever-increasing numbers and diversity of type; the very much diminished importance both as respects numbers and size of many of those forms of vegetable life which were most prominent in pre-Tertiary times, such as the ferns, the lycopods, and the cycads, and the development of modern forest vegetation, in which the dicotyledonous angiosperms play a very important part; the zonal distribution of life and climate; the evidence, furnished in abundance in various parts of the world, of a marked diminution in temperature going on through Tertiary times, the proof of which, if begun before the Tertiary, could only be obtained with great difficulty, if at all, owing to the small relative importance of the land-areas; and, finally, the appearance of man upon the earth, an event which took place, so far as is known from present available evidence, some time before the close of the Pliocene. See also Post-tertiary, Quaternary, and recent, 4. (b) [cap.] A member of the third order (tertius ordo de pœnitentia) of monastic bodies. An order of this kind was first organized by St. Francis of Assisi. It was instituted as a sort of middle term between the world and the cloister, and members were required to dress more soberly, fast more strictly, pray more regularly, hear mass more frequently, and practise works of mercy more systematically than ordinary persons living in the world. The Dominicans also have their third order, and the example was followed by various other monastic bodies.

The Order of St. Francis had, and of necessity, its Tertiaries, like that of St. Dominic.
Milman, Latin Christianity, ix. 10.

(c) A color, as russet, citrine, or olive, produced by the mixture of two secondary colors. Tertiaries are grays, and are either red-gray, blue-gray, or yellow-gray when these primaries are in excess, or violet-gray, orange-gray, or green-gray when these secondaries are in excess. Fairholt. (d) Same as tertial.

tertiate (tėr'shi-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. tertiated, ppr. tertiating. [< L. tertiatus, pp. of tertiare, do every third day, do for the third time, < tertius, third: see tercel.] 1. To do for the third time. Johnson.—2. In gun., to examine, as a piece of artillery, or the thickness of its metal, to ascertain its strength. This is usually done with a pair of caliper compasses.

To tertiate a piece of ordnance is to examine the thickness of the metal, in order to judge of its strength, the position of the trunnions, etc. Wilhelm, Mil. Dict.

tertium quid (tėr'shi-um kwid). [L.: tertium, neut. of tertius, third; quid, something, somewhat, neut. of indef. pronoun quis, somebody: see what, who.] 1. Something neither mind nor matter; especially, an idea regarded as not a mere modification of the mind nor a purely external thing in itself. Hence—2. Something mediating between essentially opposite things.

tertium sal (tėr'shi-um sal). [L.: tertium, neut. of tertius, third; sal, salt.] In old chem., a neutral salt, as being the product of an acid and an alkali, making a third substance different from either.

Tertullianism (tėr-tul'yan-izm), n. The doctrine and discipline of the Tertullianists, involving special rigor as to absolution of penitents, opposition to second marriages, etc.

About a year after this, he [Mr. Cotton] practically appeared in opposition to Tertullianism, by proceeding unto a second marriage. Cotton Mather, Mag. Chris., III. i.

Tertullianist (tėr-tul'yan-ist), n. [< Tertullian (LL. Tertullianus) + -ist.] A member of a branch of the African Montanists, of the third and fourth centuries, holding to the doctrines of Montanism as modified by Tertullian. The divergence of the Tertullianists from orthodoxy seems to have been much less marked than that of the original Asiatic Montanists. They called themselves "Pneumatics," or spiritual men, and the Catholics "Psychics," natural or sensual men.

teruncius (tē-run'shi-us), n.; pl. teruncii (-ī). [L., three twelfths of an as (see as[4]), hence a trifle, < ter, three times, thrice, + uncia, the twelfth part of anything: see ounce[1].] An ancient Roman coin, being the fourth part of the as, and weighing 3 ounces.

teru-tero (ter'ö-ter'ō), n. [S. Amer.; imitative of the bird's note.] The Cayenne lapwing, or spur-winged plover, Vanellus or Belonopterus cayennensis, a South American bird of the plover kind. It resembles the common pewit, but is easily distinguished. The wings are spurred, and there is a minute hallux. The back and wings are resplendent with metallic iridescence of violet-green and bronze; the breast is black; the lining of the wings is white; the head is crested. During incubation it attempts to lead enemies away from its nest by feigning to be wounded, like many other birds. The eggs are esteemed a delicacy. Its wild and weird notes often disturb the stillness of the pampas.

Teru-tero (Belonopterus cayennensis).

tervet, v. [ME. terven, tervien, < AS. tyrfian*, in comp. getyrfian (= OHG. zerben), fall. Cf. torve, tervy, topsyturvy. Also in comp. overterve, ME. overterven, used awkwardly in one passage with toppe preceding, as if top-overterve* (an expression appar. connected with the later topsy-tervy, now topsyturvy, q. v.). Cf. tervy, tirfe.] I. intrans. To fall; be thrown down.

And I schal crye rigtful kyng,
Ilk man haue as the serue,
The rigt schul ryse to ryche reynynge,
Truyt and treget to helle schal terve.
Holy Rood (ed. Morris), p. 207.

II. trans. 1. To dash down; cast; throw; in composition with over, to overthrow; overturn.

Ovyr (tyr)yn (ovyr tyrvyn, K. ouerturnen, S. H. ouurturuyn, P.). Subverto, everto. Prompt. Parv. (1440), p. 373.

So dred they hym, they durst no thing ouer terue
Againe his lawe nor peace.
J. Hardyng, Chron. of Eng. (ed. Ellis, 1812), p. 47.

The lawe and peace he kepte, and conserued,
Which him vpheld, that he was neuer ouer terued.
J. Hardyng, Chron. of Eng. (ed. Ellis, 1812), p. 75.

2. To turn down or back; roll or fold over.

tervee, v. See tervy.

tervy (tėr'vi), v. i. [Also tervee, turvee, tarvy. Cf. terve.] To struggle; kick or tumble about, as to get free. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

tery†, a. A Middle English spelling of teary.

terza-rima (ter'tsä-rē'mä), n. [< It. terza rima: terza, fem. of terzo, third; rima, rime: see tierce and rime[1].] A form of verse in iambic rhythm used by the early Italian poets. In it the lines consist of ten or eleven syllables, and are arranged in sets of three that are closely connected. The middle line of the first tiercet rimes with the first and third lines of the second tiercet, the middle line of the second tiercet rimes with the first and third lines of the third tiercet, and so on. At the end of the poem or canto there is an extra line which has the same rime as the middle line of the preceding tiercet. In this form of verse Dante's "Divina Commedia" is written. The most conspicuous example of its use in English literature is Byron's "Prophecy of Dante."

terzetto (ter-tset'ō), n. [It., < terzo, third: see tierce.] In music, a composition for three voices; a vocal trio.

tesa (tē'zä), n. See teesa.

teschenite (tesh'en-īt), n. [< Teschen, a town in Austrian Silesia, + -ite[2].] The name given by Hohenegger to certain eruptive rocks intercalated and intrusive in the Cretaceous on the borders of Silesia and Moravia, and which have been the subject of discussion among geologists since 1821. Tschermak described them in 1866, and considered them as belonging to two quite different groups, one of which included rocks identical with or analogous to the picrites, while for the other he adopted Hohenegger's name. The latter group (the teschenites of Tschermak) have again been divided by Rosenbusch, who refers a part of them to the diabases, while the other portion is considered by him to have been originally essentially a mixture of plagioclase, nephelin, brown amphibole, and biotite, but now containing analcite instead of nephelin. Rocks of somewhat similar character have been described from various other regions, as from the Caucasus and Portugal, and have been supposed to consist in part of nephelin. The question of the composition of the teschenites still remains obscure, since analcite has been observed in many instances, and petrographers are not agreed in considering it as necessarily an alteration-product of nephelin.

tesho-lama (tesh'ō-lä'mä), n. [Tibetan.] One of the two lama-popes of the Buddhists of Tibet and Mongolia, each of whom is supreme in his own district, the other being the dalai-lama, who, though nominally his equal, is really the more powerful. Also called bogdo-lama. See dalai-lama.

Tesia (tē'si-ä), n. [NL. (Hodgson, 1837), from a Nepaulese name.] A generic name under which Hodgson originally, and after him other writers, described several small wren-like birds of India, later determined to represent different genera and conventionally referred to the Timeliidæ. Hodgson in 1841 proposed to replace the name Tesia by Anura, which, however, being preoccupied, was by him in 1845 changed to Pnoëpyga; and at the same time he proposed a new generic name Oligura for some of the birds he had before called Tesia. The result is that (a) some authors discard Tesia, and separate its species into the two genera Pnoëpyga and Oligura, while (b) most authors use Tesia for the species of Oligura, and put there the other birds which had been called Tesia. The species of Tesia in sense (b) are 3 in number—T. castaneicoronata, Tesia (Oligura) castaneicoronata.

T. cyaneiventris, and T. superciliaris; they belong to the eastern Himalayan region and southward. Compare the figure here given with that under Pnoëpyga.

tessarace (tes-a-rā'sē), n. [< Gr. τέσσαρες, four, + ἀκή, a point.] A tetrahedral summit.

tessaradecad (tes-a-ra-dek'ad), n. [< Gr. τέσσαρες, four (see four), + δεκάς (δεκαδ-), the number ten: see decad.] A group of fourteen individuals; an aggregate of fourteen. Farrar.

tessarescædecahedron (tes-a-res-ē-dek-a-hē'drọn), n. [LGr. τεσσαρεσκαιδεκάεδρον, < Gr. τεσσαρεσκαίδεκα, fourteen (see fourteen), + ἕδρα, base or face of a polyhedron.] A solid having fourteen faces. The cuboctahedron, the truncated octahedron, and the truncated cube are examples of such bodies. See Archimedean solid, under Archimedean.

Tessaria (te-sā'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Ruiz and Pavon, 1794), named after L. Tessari, professor of botany at Ancona.] A genus of composite plants, of the tribe Inuleæ and subtribe Plucheineæ. It is distinguished from the related genus Pluchea by hoary or silky and shrubby stems bearing small cymose or corymbose heads with an ovoid involucre of two kinds of bracts, the outer somewhat woolly, the inner scarious and often shining. The 4 species are all American, and chiefly of temperate or mountainous parts of the west coast of South America. They resemble species of Gnaphalium or life-everlasting in their frequent white-woolly clothing; their leaves are alternate entire and toothed; their flowers are purplish and small, and are sometimes very numerous.

tesseledt, a. See tessellcd.

For the wals glistered with red marble and pargeting of divers colours, yea all the house was paved with checker and tesseled worke. Knolles's Hist. Turks (1603). (Nares.) tessella (te-sel'ä), n.; pl. tessellæ (-ē). [< L. tessella, a small square stone, dim. of tessera, a square, tessera: see tessera.] Same as tessera.

tessellar (tes'e-lär), a. [< LL. tessellarius, one who makes tessellæ, < L. tessella, a little cube or square: see tessella.] Made up of tesseræ. See tessellated.

Tessellata (tes-e-lā'tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. tessellatus, checkered: see tessellate.] 1. A group of tessellate Paleozoic sea-urchins, synonymous with Palæchinoidea.—2. Tessellated crinoids; an order of Crinoidea, having the calyx formed entirely of calcareous plates, and the oral surface without ambulacral furrows, as in the genera Actinocrinus and Cyathocrinus.

tessellate (tes'e-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. tessellated, ppr. tessellating. [< L. tessellatus, made of small square stones, checkered, < tessella, a small square stone: see tessella.] To form by inlaying differently colored materials, as a pavement, hence, to variegate.

It was the affectation of some to tesselate their conversation with antiquated and obsolete words.
Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 335.

★ tessellate (tes'e-lāt), a. In zoöl., same as tessellated, 3.

tessellated (tes'e-lā-ted), a. [< L. tessellatus, made of small square stones, checkered (see tessellate), + -ed[2].] 1. Formed of small pieces of stone, glass, or the like, generally square or four-sided in plan, and long in proportion to their breadth. See tessera, 1.—2. In bot., checkered; having the colors arranged in small squares, thus resembling a tessellated pavement.—3. In zoöl., checkered or reticulated in a regular manner, by either the coloration or the formation of the parts of a surface. (a) Having colored patches resembling mosaic work or a checker-board. (b) Divided by raised lines into square or angular spaces. (c) Having distinct square scales.—Tessellated cells, flattened epithelial cells united at their edges into pavement epithelium.—Tessellated epithelium. Same as pavement epithelium. See epithelium.—Tessellated work, inlaid work composed of square or four-sided pieces, or tesseræ. Mosaic in the ordinary senses is comprised in this.

tessellation (tes-e-lā'shon), n. [< tessellat(ed) + -ion.] 1. The act or art of making inlaid work with tesseræ.—2. The work so produced.

Additions to the old glass tessellation in the pulpit.
Planché, in Jour. Brit. Archæol. Ass., XV. 138.

★ tessera (tes'e-rä), n.; pl. tesseræ (-rē). [= F. tessère = Sp. tésera = Pg. It. tessera, < L. tessera, a small cube or square of stone, wood, etc., a cube, die, tablet, tessera, ticket, token, < Gr. τέσσαρες, Ionic τέσσερες, four: see four.] 1. A small piece of hard material, generally square in plan, used in combination with others of similar character for making mosaics. Tesseræ are small in surface, and are thick in proportion, and therein differ from tiles, which are large and flat.—2. A die for playing games of chance.—3. A small square of bone, wood, or the like used in ancient Rome as a ticket of admission to the theater, etc.—4. Same as tessera hospitalis (which see, below). [Rare.]

Tesseræ, shown separately and combined in mosaic. (From a Roman pavement discovered in London.)

The fathers composed a form of confession, not as a prescript rule of faith to build the hopes of our salvation on, but as a tessera of that communion, which, by public authority, was therefore established upon those articles.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 321.

Tessera frumentari, in Rom. antiq., a ticket entitling the holder to a dole of bread, corn, or other provisions.—Tessera hospitalis, in Rom. antiq., a pledge of mutual friendship, which was broken in twain, as is a coin by modern lovers, and one half retained by each person. It served as a means of recognition and a pledge of admission to hospitality between the families and descendants of the friends.

As in Greece, the connexion [between host and guest in Rome] often became hereditary; and a tessera hospitalis was broken between the parties. Encyc. Brit., XII. 308.

Tessera militaris, in Rom. antiq., a small billet of wood on which the watchword was inscribed for distribution to the soldiery, and on which was sometimes written an order or an address of the commanding officer.—Tessera nummaria, a ticket entitling the holder to a dole of money. One engraved in Caylus's Recueil is marked Ar. xii. (that is, 12 silver coins or denarii).—Tessera theatralis, in Rom. antiq., the ticket or check by which admission to the theater was granted: one found at Pompeii fixes the seat which the holder was to occupy by the number of the cuneus, the row, and the seat.

tesseraic (tes-e-rā'ik), a. [< tessera + -ic.] ★ Same as tessellar. [Rare.]

tesseral (tes'e-ral), a. [< tessera + -al.] 1. Same as tessellar. [Rare.]—2. In crystal., same as isometric.

tesserarian† (tes-e-rā'ri-an), a. [< L. tesserarius, of or pertaining to a tessera (< tessera, a tessera), + -an.] Of or pertaining to play or gaming: as, the tesserarian art.

tessitura (tes-si-tö'rä), n. [It., texture, = E. texture.] In music, of a melody or a voice-part, that part of its total compass in which the greater number of its tones lie. To voices of moderate cultivation it is more important that the tessitura, or average field of the tones, should be convenient than that all extreme tones should be avoided.

tessular (tes'ū-lär), a. [Irreg. for tesserular*, < L. tesserula, dim. of tessera, a tessera.] In ★ crystal., same as isometric.

test[1] (test), n. [< ME. test, teest, teste = G. test, < OF. test, F. têt = Sp. tiesto = Pg. It. testo, an earthen vessel, esp. a pot in which metals were tried, < L. testum, also testu, the lid of an earthen vessel, an earthen vessel, an earthen pot, in ML. esp. an earthen pot in which metals were tried; cf. testa, a piece of burned clay, a potsherd, an earthen pot, pitcher, jug (see test[2]); < terstus*, pp. of the root seen also in terra for tersa*, dry land: see terra, thirst. Cf. test[2].] 1†. An earthen pot in which metals were tried.

Our cementing and fermentacioun,
Our ingottes, testes, and many mo.
Chaucer, Prol. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 265.

Put it [gold] in a teste made accordynge to the quantitie of the same, and melt it therin with leade whiche yowe shall consume partely by vapoure and partely with drawynge it owt by the syde of the teste.
R. Eden, tr. of Vannuccio Biringuccio (First Books on [America, ed. Arber, p. 366).

Specifically—2. The movable hearth or cupel of a reverberatory furnace, used in separating silver from lead by cupellation (see cupel), according to the method usually followed in England. It consists of an oval wrought-iron frame, about 5 feet long and 2½ wide, crossed by several iron bars on the bottom, thus forming a receptacle for the finely powdered bone-ash with which the frame is filled, and in which a cavity is scooped out to hold the melted metal while it is being cupeled. The test rests on a car, on which it is wheeled into its place under the reverberatory furnace when ready for use. The hearth of the German cupellation furnace, on the other hand, is fixed in its place, but is covered by an iron dome, which can be lifted off by the aid of a crane.

3. Examination by the test or cupel; hence, any critical trial or examination: as, a crucial test.

Let there be some more test made of my metal,
Before so noble and so great a figure
Be stamp'd upon it. Shak., M. for M., i. 1. 49.

Thy virtue, prince, has stood the test of fortune,
Like purest gold. Addison, Cato, iv. 4.

Many Things when most conceal'd are best;
And few of strict Enquiry bear the Test.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

4. Means of trial; that by which the presence, quality, or genuineness of something is shown; touchstone.

Unerring Nature . . .
Life, force, and beauty must to all impart,
At once the source, and end, and test of Art.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 73.

With the great mass of mankind, the test of integrity in a public man is consistency. Macaulay, Sir W. Temple.

5. [cap.] The Test Act of 1673. See phrase below.

Our penal laws no sons of yours admit,
Our Test excludes your tribe from benefit.
Dryden, Hind and Panther, iii. 830.

6. In chem., a substance which is employed to detect the presence of any ingredient in a compound, by causing it to exhibit some known property; a substance which, being added to another, indicates the chemical nature of that other substance by producing certain changes in appearance and properties; a reagent: thus, infusion of galls is a test of the presence of iron, which it renders evident by the production of a black color in liquids containing that metal; litmus is a test for determining the presence of acids when uncombined or in excess, as its blue color is turned red by acids.—7. Judgment; discrimination; distinction.

Who would excel, when few can make a test
Betwixt indifferent writing and the best? Dryden.

8. An apparatus for proving light hydrocarbon oils by heat, to find the temperature at which they evolve explosive vapors; an oil test. E. H. Knight.—Böttger's sugar test, a test for sugar in urine, consisting in boiling with a solution of sodium carbonate and basic bismuth nitrate. If sugar is present, a black precipitate is produced.—Breslau's test, the placing of the stomach and intestines of a dead new-born infant in water immediately after removal. It was formerly supposed their floating was a proof that the child had been born alive.—Bryce's test, a test of the genuineness of a vaccination by revaccinating at another point. If the first vaccination is genuine the second vaccination will, if made a short time after the first, follow an accelerated course, though dwarfed in size; or if it is made later, say after the fifth day, the second inoculation will not develop.—Catoptric test, a former method of diagnosing cataracts by means of the changes observed in the reflected images of a light held in front of an eye affected by cataract, as differing from those of a normal eye.—Day's blood test, a test for blood in which the suspected stain is treated first with fresh tincture of guaiacum and then with hydrogen peroxid in watery or ethereal solution. If blood be present a sapphire-blue stain is produced.—Ehrlich's test, Same as Ehrlich's reaction (which see, under reaction).—Physiological test. See physiological.—Reinsch's test, a test for the presence of arsenic, which consists in heating the suspected solution strongly acidified with hydrochloric acid, with a strip of bright metallic copper immersed in it. The arsenic is deposited as a gray film.—Rosenthal's test, a test by means of electricity for caries of the spine.—Schiff's test, a means of detecting uric acid or a urate by silver nitrate.—Test Act, an English statute of 1673. It made all ineligible to hold office under the crown who did not take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, or receive the sacrament according to the usage of the Church of England, or subscribe the Declaration against Transubstantiation. It was directed against Roman Catholics, but was applicable also to Dissenters. It was repealed in 1828.—Test types, letters of various sizes used by oculists in testing vision.—The test of conceivability, of inconceivability. See conceivability, inconceivability.—To take the test, to submit to the Test Act; take the sacrament in testimony of being a member of the Church of England.—Syn. 3 and 4. Proof, ordeal, criterion. See inference.

test[1] (test), v. t. [< test[1], n.] 1. In metal., to refine, as gold or silver, by means of lead, in a test, by the removal by scorification of all extraneous matter, or in some other way.

Not with fond shekels of the tested gold.
Shak., M. for M., ii. 2. 149.

2. To put to the test; bring to trial and examination; compare with a standard; try: as, to test the soundness of a principle; to test the validity of an argument; to test a person's loyalty; to test the electrical resistance of a wire.

The value of a belief is tested by applying it.
Leslie Stephen, Eng. Thought, I. 20.

3. Specifically, in chem., to examine by the use of some reagent or special treatment.

test[2] (test), n. [Early mod. E. teste; < OF. teste, F. tête = Sp. Pg. It. testa, a shell, the head, < L. testa, a piece of earthenware, a tile, etc., a potsherd, an earthen pot, pitcher, jug, etc., a shell of shell-fish and testaceous animals: see test[1]. The later E. uses are technical, and directly from the L.] 1†. A potsherd.

Then was the teste or potsherd, the brasse, golde, & syluer redacte into duste. Joye, Expos. of Daniel, ii.

2. In zoöl., the hard covering of certain animals; a shell; a lorica. Tests are of various textures and substances, generally either chitinous, calcareous, or silicious, sometimes membranous or fibrous. See shell, 2, and skeleton, 1. Specifically—(a) The outermost case or covering of the ascidians, or Tunicata. It is homologous with the house of the appendicularian tunicates, and is remarkable among animal structures in that it is impregnated with a kind of cellulose called tunicin. testæ, n. Plural of testa.

testament (tes'tạ-ment), n. [< ME. testament, < OF. (and F.) testament = Pr. testament = Sp. Pg. It. testamento = G. Dan. Sw. testament, < L. testamentum, the publication of a will, a will, testament, in LL. one of the divisions of the Bible (an incorrect translation, first in Tertullian, of Gr. διαθήκη, a covenant (applied in this sense to the two divisions of the Bible), also, in another use, a will, testament), < testari, be a witness, testify, attest, make a will: see test[3], v.] 1. In law, a will; a disposition of property or rights, to take effect at death. Originally will, in English law, signified such a disposition of real property, testament such a disposition of personal property. Will now includes both, and testament is rarely used in modern law, except in the now tautological phrase last will and testament.

"Fare well," quath the frere, "for y mot hethen fonden [go hence],
And hyen to an housewife that hath vs bequethen
Ten pounds in hir testament."
Piers Plowman's Crede (E. E. T. S.), l. 410.

The succession of the crown, it was contended, had been limited, by repeated testaments of their princes, to male heirs. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 4.

2. A disposition of the rights of two parties, defining their mutual relation, and the rights conceded by one to the other; a covenant, especially between God and his people. Hence—3. (a) A dispensation: used especially of the Mosaic or old dispensation and of the Christian or new. (b) [cap.] A collection of books containing the history and doctrines of each of these dispensations, and known severally as the Old Testament and the New Testament. The word testament in the authorized version of the Bible always represents the Greek word διαθήκη (elsewhere rendered 'covenant'), which in early Christian Latin and regularly in the Vulgate is rendered 'testamentum,' perhaps from its use in Heb. ix. 15–20. In this passage the idea of a covenant as involving in ancient times a sacrifice with shedding of blood is blended with that of a last will made operative by the death of the testator. In Mat. xxvi. 28 and parallel passages the phrase "blood of the new testament" is connected with the cup in the Lord's Supper. In 2 Cor. iii. 14 the expression "reading of the old testament" shows the transition of meaning to our application of the title Old Testament to the Hebrew Scriptures. (Compare 1 Mac. i. 57.) When used alone the word commonly means a copy of the New Testament: as, a gift of Bibles and Testaments.

She having innocently learn'd the way
Thro' both the serious Testaments to play.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, i. 70.

In its pre-Christian stage the religion of revelation is represented as a covenant between the spiritual God and His chosen people the Hebrews. In accordance with this, and in allusion to Jer. xxxi. 31, Jesus speaks of the new dispensation founded in His death as a new covenant (1 Cor. xi. 25). Hence, as early as the 2d century of our era, the two great divisions of the Bible were known as the books of the Old and of the New Covenant respectively. Among Latin-speaking Christians the Greek word for covenant was often incorrectly rendered testament, and thus Western Christendom still uses the names of the Old and New Testaments. Encyc. Brit., III. 634.

Derogatory clause in a testament. See clause.—Inofficious testament. See inofficious.—Mancipatory testament, a kind of testament allowed by the early Roman law, and continued in use till the middle ages in the form of a public and irrevocable conveyance of the testator's estates, rights, privileges, and duties: also called the testament with copper and scales, from the formality of producing a scale for the uncoined copper money of ancient Rome. Maine.—Military testament. See military.—Pretorian testament, a will allowed by the Pretorian edicts, by which legacies could be made, and the transfer could be directed to be kept secret till death. Maine.

testimony (tes'ti-mō-ni), n.; pl. testimonies (-niz). [= F. temoin = Pr. testimoni = Sp. testimonio = Pg. testimunho = It. testimone, testimonio, < L. testimonium, testimony, < testis, a witness: see test[3].] 1. Witness; evidence; proof or demonstration of some fact.

I'll give you all noble remembrances,
As testimonies 'gainst reproach and malice,
That you departed lov'd.
Fletcher (and another?), Nice Valour, iv. 1.

I swear by truth and knighthood that I gave
No cause, not willingly, for such a love:
To this I call my friends in testimony.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

2. In law, the statement or declaration of a witness; oral evidence; a solemn statement or declaration under oath or affirmation, made as evidence before a tribunal or an officer for the purposes of evidence; a statement or statements made in proof of something.—3. Tenor of declarations or statements made or witness borne; declaration: as, the testimony of history.

As to the fruits of Sodom, fair without, and full of ashes within, I saw nothing of them; tho', from the testimonies we have, something of this kind has been produced. Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 37.

Who trusts
To human testimony for a fact Gets this sole fact—himself is proved a fool.
Browning, King and Book, II. 324.

4. The act of bearing witness; open attestation; profession.

Thou . . . for the testimony of truth hast borne Universal reproach. Milton, P. L., vi. 33.

The two first [Quakers in New England] that sealed their testimony with their blood were William Robinson, merchant of London, and Marmaduke Stevenson, a countryman of Yorkshire.
Sewel, History of the Quakers (1856), I. 290.

5. A declaration or protest.

Shake off the dust under your feet, for a testimony against them. Mark vi. 11.

Alice Rose was not one to tolerate the coarse, careless talk of such a woman as Mrs. Brunton without uplifting her voice in many a testimony against it.
Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xxxix.

6. In Scrip.: (a) The law of God in general; the Scriptures.

The testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple. Ps. xix. 7.

The testimonies of God are true, the testimonies of God are perfect, the testimonies of God are all sufficient unto that end for which they were given.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, ii. 8.

(b) Specifically, the two tables of the law (tables of the testimony); the decalogue.

Thou shalt put into the ark the testimony which I shall give thee. Ex. xxv. 16.

Immediate, indirect, mediate testimony. testimony† (tes'ti-mō-ni), v. t. [< testimony, n.] To witness.

Let him be but testimonied in his own bringings-forth, and he shall appear to the envious a scholar, a statesman, and a soldier. Shak., M. for M., iii. 2. 153.

testiness (tes'ti-nes), n. The state or character of being testy; irascibility; petulance.

Macrobius saith there is much difference betwixt ire and testinesse: bycause ire groweth of an occasion, and testinesse of euil condition.
Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 114.

testing-box (tes'ting-boks), n. Same as test-box.

testing-clause (tes'ting-klâz), n. In Scots law, the clause in a formal written deed or instrument by which it is authenticated according to the forms of law. It is essentially a statement of the name and designation of the writer, the number of pages in the deed, the names and designations of the witnesses, the name and designation of the person who penned the deed, and the date and place of signing.

testing-gage (tes'ting-gāj), n. A gage for ascertaining pressure, as of gas in a soda-water bottle, etc. E. H. Knight.

testing-hole (tes'ting-hōl), n. In the steel-cementation process, same as tap-hole (c).

testing-slab (tes'ting-slab), n. A plate of white glazed porcelain having cup-shaped depressions, for the examination of liquids which give colored precipitates.

testis (tes'tis), n.; pl. testes (-tēz). [L.] 1. A testicle.—2. Some rounded formation likened to a testicle: as, the testes of the brain.—Aberrant duct of the testis. See aberrant.—Mediastinum testis. See mediastinum.—Pia mater testis. Same as tunica vasculosa.—Testis cerebri (the testicle of the brain), the postopticus; one of the posterior pair of the optic lobes or corpora quadrigemina. See quadrigeminous, 2.—Testis muliebris, a woman's testicle—that is, the ovary. Galen.

test-meal (test'mēl), n. A meal of definite quantity and quality given with a view to examining the contents of the stomach at a later hour, and thus determining the normal or abnormal condition of the gastric functions.

test-meter (test'mē″tėr), n. An apparatus for testing the consumption of gas by burners.

test-mixer (test'mik″sėr), n. A tall cylindrical bottle of clear glass, with a wide foot and a stopper. It is graduated from the bottom up into equal parts, and is used for the preparation and dilution of test-alkalis, test-acids, etc. E. H. Knight.

testo (tes'tō), n. [It., = E. text.] In music, same as (a) theme or subject, or as (b) text or libretto.

test-object (test'ob″jekt), n. In micros., a minute object, generally organic, whereby the excellence of an objective, more particularly as to defining and resolving power, may be tested, only superior objectives being capable of showing such objects, or of enabling their markings or peculiar structure to be clearly seen. The muscular fibers of the Mammalia, parts of the eye of fishes, scales of the wings of insects, and the shells or frustules of the Diatomaceæ are very generally employed. See test-plate.

teston† (tes'ton), n. [< OF. (and F.) Sp. testón (= It. testone), a coin, so called from having the figure of a head, < teste, head: see test[2]. Cf. tester[3].] 1. A silver coin of Louis XII. of France.—2. A name given both officially and popularly to the shilling coined by Henry VIII., from its resemblance in appearance and value to the French coin. The value of the coin was reduced later to sixpence.

Threepence; and here 's a teston; yet take all.
Middleton, Blurt, Master-Constable, ii. 2.

★ testone (tes-tō'ne), n. [< It. testone: see teston.] A silver coin worth about 1*s.* 4*d.* (32 United States cents), formerly current in Italy.

testoon (tes'tön), n. 1†. Same as teston.—2. [Pg. testão.] A monetary unit of Portugal, equal to 100 reis, or about eleven United States cents. Silver two-, five-, and ten-testoon pieces are coined.

test-paper (test'pā″pėr), n. 1. In chem., a paper impregnated with a chemical reagent, as litmus, and used for detecting the presence of certain substances, which cause a reaction and a change in the color of the paper.—2. In law, a document allowed to be used in a court of justice as a standard of comparison for determining a question of handwriting. [U. S.]

test-plate (test'plāt), n. 1. A glass plate with a band, or usually a series of bands, of very finely ruled lines, used in testing the resolving power of microscopic objectives, particularly of high powers. The best known are those ruled by Nobert (hence called Nobert's plates); one of these, the 19-band plate, has a series of 19 bands, ruled at rates varying from 11,300 to 112,000 lines to the inch. The finest band of another plate is ruled at the rate of about 200,000 lines to the inch. Möller's test-plate has a series of 20 or more test diatom-frustules with very fine striations, in some cases running up to nearly 100,000 per inch.
2. In ceram., a piece of pottery upon which the vitrifiable colors are tried before being used on the pieces to be decorated, usually a plate with the different colors painted on its rim.

test-pump (test'pump), n. A force-pump used for testing the strength or tightness of metal cylinders, etc. It has a pressure-gage attached to its discharge-pipe, means for connecting the latter with the pipe, etc., to be tested, a check-valve or cock for preventing regurgitation through the discharge-pipe, and generally also a cistern of moderate capacity for holding a supply of water for the pump-barrel, in which latter works a solid plunger operated by a hand-lever. The pump is supplied with lifting-handles or with wheels for moving it easily about to any position in a shop.

testril† (tes'tril), n. Same as tester[3].

Sir Toby. Come on; there is sixpence for you: let's have a song.
Sir Andrew. There 's a testril of me too: if one knight give a—Shak., T. N., ii. 3. 34.

test-spoon (test'spön), n. A small spoon with a spatula-shaped handle, used for taking up small portions of flux, powder, etc., as in chemical experiments. E. H. Knight.

test-tube (test'tūb), n. 1. A cylinder of thin glass closed at one end, used in testing liquids.—2. A chlorometer.—Test-tube culture. See culture.

Test-tubes.

test-types (test'tīps), n. pl. Letters or words printed in type of different sizes, used to determine the acuteness of vision.

testudinal (tes-tū'di-nal), a. [< L. testudo (-din-), a tortoise (see testudo), + -al.] Pertaining to or resembling a tortoise.

Testudinaria (tes-tū-di-nā'ri-ą), n. [NL. (Salisbury, 1824), < L. testudo (-din-), a tortoise, + -aria.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the family Dioscoreaceæ. It is distinguished from Dioscorea by its downwardly winged seeds and its large hemispherical tessellated tuber or rootstock, which is either fleshy and solid or woody, and rises above the ground, forming a globular mass sometimes 4 feet in diameter, its outer woody or corky substance becoming cracked into large angular protuberances resembling the shell of a tortoise. (See tortoise-plant.) The 2 species are natives of South Africa. They are lofty climbers with slender twining stems, alternate leaves, and small racemose flowers, which are dœcious and spreading or broadly bell-shaped, with a three-celled ovary becoming in fruit a three-winged capsule. They are known as elephant's-foot and as Hottentot's-bread.

testudinarious (tes-tū-di-nā'ri-us), a. Resembling tortoise-shell in color; mottled with red, yellow, and black, like tortoise-shell.

Testudinata (tes-tū-di-nā'tą), n. pl. [NL. (Oppel, 1811), neut. pl. of L. testudinatus: see testudinate.] 1. An order of Reptilia, having toothless jaws fashioned like the beak of a bird, two pairs of limbs fitted for walking or swimming, and the body incased in a bony box or leathery shell, consisting of a carapace and a plastron, to the formation of which the ribs and dorsal vertebræ are specially modified; the turtles and tortoises. The carapace is usually covered with hard horny epidermal plates called tortoise-shell. There is no true sternum, its place being taken by a number of bones, typically nine, which compose the plastron, or under shell. The dorsal vertebræ are immovably fixed. All the cranial bones are united by sutures, excepting the articulation of the lower jaw. The pelvis consists as usual of ilium, ischium, and pubis, but it has a peculiar shape, and is generally discrete from the sacrum. The penis is single and intracloacal, and the anus is a longitudinal cleft. Also called Chelonia. See also cuts under Aspidonectes, carapace, Chelonia, Chelonidæ, leatherback, plastron, Pleurospondylia, Pyxis, slider, terrapin, and Testudo, 4.

Testudo elephantopus, one of the Testudinata.

2. In a restricted sense, one of three suborders of Chelonia, contrasted with Athecæ and Trionychoidea, and containing the whole of the order excepting the Sphargididæ and the Trionychidæ.

testudinate (tes-tū'di-nāt), a. and n. [< L. testudinatus, < testudo (-din-), a tortoise: see testudo.]
I. a. 1. Resembling the carapace of a tortoise; arched; vaulted; fornicated. Also testudinated.—2. Of or pertaining to the Testudinata; chelonian.
II. n. One of the Testudinata or Chelonia.

testudinated (tes-tū'di-nā-ted), a. [< testudinate + -ed[2].] Same as testudinate, 1.

testudineal (tes-tū-din'ē-al), a. [< testudine-ous + -al.] Same as testudinal.

testudineous (tes-tū-din'ē-us), a. [< L. testudineus, of or pertaining to a tortoise or tortoise-shell, < testudo (-din-), a tortoise: see testudo.] Resembling the carapace of a tortoise.

Testudinidæ (tes-tū-din'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Testudo (-din-) + -idæ.] A family of cryptodirous tortoises, named from the genus Testudo, containing numerous genera, both fossil and recent, the latter found in all temperate and tropical regions except the Australian. The plastron has the typical number of nine bones, the carapace has epidermal scutes, the nuchal bone is without a costiform process, and the caudal vertebræ are procœlous. It has been by far the largest family of the order, including several genera usually put in other families, but is now oftener restricted to land-tortoises with high, arched, and vaulted carapace and short clubbed feet. Chersidæ is a synonym. See cuts under pyxis and Testudo, 4.

testudo (tes-tū'dō), n.; pl. testudines (-di-nēz). [L., a tortoise-shell, a defensive cover so called, < testa, a shell, etc.: see test[2].] 1. Among the ancient Romans, a defensive cover or screen which a body of troops formed by overlapping above their heads their oblong shields when in close array. This cover somewhat resembled the back of a tortoise, and served to shelter the men from missiles thrown from above. The name was also given to a structure movable on wheels or rollers for protecting sappers. Formerly also called snail.

2. A shelter similar in shape and design to the above employed as a defense by miners and others when working in ground or rock which is liable to cave in.—3. In med., an encysted tumor, which has been supposed to resemble the shell of a turtle. Also called talpa.—4. [cap.] [NL.] In herpet., the typical genus of Testudinidæ, of widely varying limits with different authors, and much confused with Cistudo. It now contains such tortoises as T. græca of Europe and some others. See cut on following page, also that under Testudinata.
5. In anat., the fornix: more fully called testudo cerebri. See cerebrum.—6. In anc. music, a species of lyre: so called in allusion to the lyre of Mercury, fabled to have been made of the shell of the sea-tortoise. The name was also extended in medieval music to the lute.

Common European Tortoise (Testudo græca).

testule (test'ūl), n. [< L. testula, dim. of testa, a shell, etc.: see test[2], 2.] In bot., the silicified crust of a diatom, usually called the frustule.

testy (tes'ti), a. [Early mod. E. testie, teastie; < ME. testif, < OF. testu, F. têtu, heady, headstrong, testy, < teste, head: see test[2].] Irritable; irascible; choleric; cross; petulant.

Chaucer, Troilus, v. 802.

I was displeased with myself; I was testy, as Jonah was when he should go preach to the Ninevites.
Latimer, Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1550.

Must I stand and crouch
Under your testy humour? Shak., J. C., iv. 3. 46.

Thou testy little dogmatist, Thou pretty Katydid!
O. W. Holmes, To an Insect.

=Syn. Pettish, touchy, waspish, snappish, peevish, splenetic, captious, peppery.

tet (tet), n. Same as tit[1].

tetanet, n. [< L. tetanus: see tetanus.] Tetanus. Donne, Letters, xiv.

tetanic (tē-tan'ik), a. and n. [= F. tétanique = Sp. tetánico = Pg. tetanico, < L. tetanicus, < Gr. τετανικός, affected with tetanus, < τέτανος, tetanus: see tetanus.] I. a. Pertaining to, of the nature of, or characterized by tetanus.—Tetanic spasm, tonic spasm of the voluntary muscles, as seen in tetanus, strychnic poisoning, or the first stage of a typical epileptic attack.

II. n. In med., a remedy which acts on the nerves, and through them on the muscles, as nux vomica, strychnia, brucina, etc. If taken in overdoses tetanics occasion convulsions and death.

tetaniform (tet'a-ni-fôrm), a. [< L. tetanus, tetanus, + forma, form.] Of the nature of or resembling tetanus; tetanoid.

tetanigenous (tet-a-nij'e-nus), a. [< L. tetanus, tetanus, + gignere, produce.] Producing tetanus, or spasms similar to those of tetanus.

tetanilla (tet-a-nil'ä), n. [NL., dim. of tetanus.] 1. Tetany.—2. An affection (paramyoclonus multiplex) characterized by a clonic spasm of groups of voluntary muscles, often symmetrical, which ceases during sleep. Althaus. tetanin (tet'a-nin), n. [< tetanus (see def.) + -in[2].] A toxin ($C_{13}H_{20}N_2O_4$) obtained from cultures of the Bacillus tetani.

tetanization (tet″a-ni-zā'shon), n. [< tetanize + -ation.] The production of tetanus; the application of a rapid succession of stimuli to a muscle or a nerve such as would produce tetanic contraction in a muscle.

tetanize (tet'a-nīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. tetanized, ppr. tetanizing. [< tetanus + -ize.] To induce a condition of tonic spasm in (a muscle).

tetanoid (tet'a-noid), a. and n. [< Gr. τετανοειδής, like tetanus, < τέτανος, tetanus, + εἶδος, form.] I. a. Resembling tetanus.—Tetanoid pseudoparaplegia. Same as spastic spinal paralysis (which see, under paralysis).

II. n. An attack of tetanus or some similar spasmodic disease.

tetanomotor (tet-a-nō-mō'tor), n. [< L. tetanus, tetanus, lit. a stretching, + motor, a mover.] An instrument devised by Heidenhain for stimulating a nerve mechanically by causing an ivory hammer attached to the vibrating spring of an induction-machine to beat upon it.

tetanotoxin (tet″a-nō-tok'sin), n. [< tetanus (see def.) + toxin.] A toxin (C_{3} N) obtained from cultures of Bacillus tetani.

tetanus (tet'a-nus), n. [NL., < L. tetanus, tetanus, < Gr. τέτανος, spasm, tetanus, lit. a stretching, tension (cf. τετανός, stretched), reduplicated from τείνειν (√ τεν, ταν), stretch: see tend[1].] 1. A disease characterized by a more or less violent and rigid spasm of many or all of the muscles of voluntary motion, especially those of the neck and jaw. Sometimes single groups of muscles are contracted, the resulting condition being called (1) trismus, or lockjaw; (2) opisthotonos, where the body is thrown back by spasmodic contractions of the muscles; (3) emprosthotonos, where the body is bent forward; (4) pleurothotonos, where the body is bent to one side. The affection occurs more frequently in warm climates than in cold. The recognized cause of the disease is the tetanus bacillus, a microbe living in damp soil and in manure. It gains entrance to the body in wounds; being anaërobic, it cannot develop in clean-cut open wounds but finds conditions favorable to its growth in lacerated wounds, such as those made in the hand by toy pistols, or in a punctured wound, such as may be made in the foot by a rusty nail. The disease may also occur without any evident wound, being then called idiopathic; it is probable that in such case the bacillus has found lodgment in some unnoticed abrasion of the skin or mucous membrane. Tetanus has also been observed among domesticated animals, such as the horse, ox, sheep, pig, and dog, in which it is usually the sequel of wounds and injuries. It may follow the operation of castration, and appear after parturition in cows. In the horse injuries of the foot are most frequently the cause of tetanus.

2. In physiol., the state or condition of prolonged contraction which a muscle assumes under rapidly repeated stimuli.

The term tetanus applies primarily to the muscle only.
G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 106.

Artificial tetanus, a state of the system induced by certain poisons, as strychnine, brucine, or the salts of either, in which the symptoms of intense tetanus are exhibited.

tetany (tet'a-ni), n. [< L. tetanus, tetanus: see tetanus.] A disease characterized by irregularly intermittent tonic spasms of various groups of muscles, more commonly those of the upper extremities, unaccompanied, as a rule, by fever. It is seen most frequently in individuals between fifteen and thirty-five years of age. Among the causes of the affection are mentioned pregnancy, lactation, exposure to cold and wet, intestinal irritation, and mental shock. It sometimes occurs as a sequel to scarlet fever and other diseases of childhood. The disease seldom results fatally, except when the muscles of respiration are profoundly affected.

tetartohedral (te-tär-tō-hē'dral), a. [< Gr. τέταρτος, fourth (< τέσσαρες, four: see fourth, four), + ἕδρα, a seat, a base.] In crystal., having one fourth the number of planes requisite to complete symmetry.

tetartohedrally (te-tär-tō-hē'dral-i), adv. In a tetartohedral form or arrangement.

tetartohedrism (te-tär-tō-hē'drizm), n. [< tetartohedr(al) + -ism.] In crystal., the state or property of being modified tetartohedrally, or of being characterized by the presence of one fourth of the planes required by holohedral symmetry. It can most simply be regarded as resulting from the application of the two methods of hemihedrism, and hence is possible in the isometric, tetragonal, and hexagonal systems, in which the two kinds of hemihedrism are observed. Practically it has been noted in a few substances crystallizing in the isometric system, and in a number belonging to the hexagonal system. In the latter there are two kinds: the first is called rhombohedral tetartohedrism, when the resulting tetartohedral form is a rhombohedron, as, for example, with dioptase and phenacite; and the second trapezohedral tetartohedrism, when the resulting form is a trigonal trapezohedron: this is characteristic of quartz and cinnabar, and is important as being connected with the phenomena of circular polarization.

tetartoprismatic (te-tär″tō-priz-mat'ik), a. [< Gr. τέταρτος, fourth, + πρίσμα(τ-), prism: see prismatic.] In crystal., same as triclinic.

tetartopyramid (te-tär-tō-pir'a-mid), n. [< Gr. τέταρτος, fourth, + πυραμίς, pyramid: see pyramid.] A quarter-pyramid: said of the pyramidal planes of the triclinic system, which appear in sets of two (that is, one fourth the number required by a complete pyramid).

tetaug (te-tâg'), n. Same as tautog. Imp. Dict.

tetch†, n. A variant of tache[3].

tetchily, tetchiness, etc. See techily, etc.

tête (tāt), n. [F., head: see test[2].] False hair; a kind of wig or cap of false hair.

Her wig or tete . . . thrown carelessly upon her toilette.
Graves, Spiritual Quixote, iii. 20. (Latham.)

tête-à-tête (tāt'à-tāt'), adv. [F., face to face, lit. 'head to head': tête, head; à (< L. ad), to; tête, head: see test[2].] Face to face; in private; in close confabulation.

The guests withdrawn had left the treat,
And down the mice sat tête-à-tête.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. vi. 197.

Lord Monmouth fell into the easy habit of dining in his private rooms, sometimes tête-à-tête with Villebecque, whose inexhaustible tales and adventures . . . had rendered him the prime favorite of his great patron.
Disraeli, Coningsby, viii. 1.

tête-à-tête (tāt'à-tāt'), a. [< tête-à-tête, adv.] Private; confidential; with none present but the persons concerned: as, a tête-à-tête conversation.—Tête-à-tête set, a set of table utensils intended for two persons only.

tête-à-tête (tāt'à-tāt'), n. [F., a private interview, < tête-à-tête, face to face: see tête-à-tête, adv.] 1. A private interview; a friendly or close conversation.

Of course there was no good in remaining among those damp, reeking timbers now that the pretty little tête-à-tête was over. Thackeray, Philip, xiv.

2. A short sofa, on which only two persons can comfortably sit.

The sofa of this set was of the pattern named tête-à-tête, very hard and slippery.
C. F. Woolson, Jupiter Lights, xiii.

tête-de-mouton (tāt'dė-mö'tôṅ), n. [F., lit. 'sheep's head': tête, head (see test[2]); de, of; mouton, sheep: see mutton.] A head-dress, common in the seventeenth century, in which the hair was arranged in short, thick, frizzled curls.

tête-de-pont (tāt'dė-pôṅ'), n. [F.: tête, head (see test[2]); de, of; pont, bridge: see pons.] In fort., a work that defends the head or entrance of a bridge nearer the enemy. See bridge-head.

tetel (tet'el), n. [Ar.] A large bubaline antelope of Africa, Alcelaphus tora, with strongly divergent and ringed horns.

teter†, n. Middle English form of tetter.

tether (teᵺ'ėr), n. [Formerly or dial. tedder; < ME. tedir, tedyre (not found in AS.) = OFries. tiader, tieder, NFries. tjudder, tjodder = MD. tudder, tuyer = MLG. tuder, tudder, LG. töder, tüder, tider, tier = Icel. tjóðhr = Sw. tjuder, OSw. tiuther = Dan. töir, tether; perhaps, with formative -ther (as in rudder[1], formerly rother, etc.), < AS. teón, etc., draw, lead: see tee[1], tie[1], tow[1]. According to Skeat, of Celtic origin, < Gael. teadhair, a tether; but this Gael. form is prob. itself of E. origin; no similar Ir. or W. form occurs, and very few words of common Teut. range are of Celtic origin. The Gael. term may, however, be independent of the E., being appar. related to taod, a halter, rope, chain, cable, taodan, a little cord, Ir. tead, teud, a cord, rope, W. tid, a chain, Manx teod, teid, a rope.] A rope, chain, or halter, especially one by which a grazing animal is confined within certain limits: often used figuratively, in the sense of a course in which one may move until checked; scope allowed.

The bishops were found culpable, as eating too much beyond their tether. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. 23.

Then in a tether he'll swing from a ladder.
Battle of Sheriff-Muir (Child's Ballads, VII. 162).

We live joyfully, going abroad within our tedder.
Bacon.

tether (teᵺ'ėr), v. t. [< tether, n.] To confine, as a grazing animal, with a rope or chain within certain limits; hence, to tie (anything) with or as with a rope or halter.

The Links of th' holy Chain which tethers
The many Members of the World togethers.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 2.

And, it was said, tethered his horse nightly among the graves in the church-yard. Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 444.

tether-stick (teᵺ'ėr-stik), n. The stake, peg, or pin to which a tether is fastened.

His teeth they were like tether sticks.
Kempy Kaye (Child's Ballads, VIII. 140).

Tethyidæ (tē-thī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tethys + -idæ.] A family of polybranchiate nudibranchiate gastropods, typified by the genus Tethys, and characterized by the absence of a tongue. The body is depressed, the mantle is indistinct, the tentacles are two, and branchial plumes alternate with papillæ along the back.

Tethys (tē'this), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1740), < Gr. Τηθύς, Tethys, a sea-goddess.] A genus of nudibranchiates, typical of the family Tethyidæ.

te-totum, n. See tee-totum.

tetra-. [< Gr. τετρα-, combining form of τέτταρες, τέσσαρες, Doric τέτορες, τέτορες, etc., neut. τέσσαρα, etc., = L. quattuor, four: see four. Cf. quadri-.] A prefix in compounds derived from the Greek, signifying 'four': as, *tetra*chord, *tetra*gon, *tetra*rch, *tetra*merous, *tetra*petalous, *tetra*spermous.

tetrablastic (tet-ra-blas'tik), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + βλαστός, a germ.] Having four germinal layers or blastodermic membranes, as an embryo—namely, an endoderm, ectoderm, and an inner and outer layer of mesoderm, or somatopleure and splanchnopleure. Such a four-layered germ is the common case of animals which have a true cœlom or body-cavity.

tetrabrach (tet'ra-brak), n. [< LGr. τετράβραχυς, of four shorts, < Gr. τετρα-, four, + βραχύς = L. brevis, short.] In anc. pros., a foot consisting of four short times or syllables; a proceleusmatic. Also tetrabrachys.

tetrabrachius (tet-ra-brā'ki-us), n.; pl. tetrabrachii (-ī). [NL., < Gr. τετρα-, four, + L. brachium, an arm.] In teratol., a monster with four arms.

tetrabranch (tet'ra-brangk), a. and n. I. a. Having two pairs of gills, as a cephalopod; belonging to the Tetrabranchiata, or having their characters.

II. n. A cephalopod of the order Tetrabranchiata, as an ammonite or a pearly nautilus.

Tetrabranchiata (tet-ra-brang-ki-ā′tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tetrabranchiatus: see tetrabranchiate.] An order of Cephalopoda, named by Owen from the two pairs of gill-plumes, or ctenidial branchiæ. The nephridia are also two pairs; two visceri-cardiac orifices open upon the exterior; and the oviducts and sperm-ducts are paired, but the left is rudimentary. There are many sheathed circumoral tentacles, not bearing suckers, two hollow eyes, two olfactory organs, no ink-bag, and a large many-chambered shell, straight or coiled. The order has included both ammonoid and nautiloid forms, but has also been restricted to the latter. They abounded in former times, as is shown by the immense number and variety of fossils, but are now nearly extinct, being represented by the pearly nautilus only. See also cut under nautilus.

Pearly Nautilus (Nautilus pompilius).

C, hood; J, funnel; M, shell-muscle; mx, jaws; p, p′, mantle; br, branchiæ; gn, nidamental gland; r, r′, position of renal appendages; ann, horny ring; ov, ovary; gal, oviducal gland; sph′, siphuncle; ch, black part of shell under mantle; kn, process of the cartilaginous skeleton into the funnel.

tetrabranchiate (tet-ra-brang′ki-āt), a. and n. [< NL. tetrabranchiatus, < Gr. τετρα-, four, + βράγχια, gills.] Same as tetrabranch.

tetracamarous (tet-ra-kam′a-rus), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + καμάρα, a vault.] In bot., having four closed carpels.

tetracarpellary (tet-ra-kär′pe-lā-ri), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + NL. carpellum, carpel, + -ary.] In bot., having four carpels.

Tetracaulodon (tet-ra-kâ′lō-don), n. [NL. (Godman), < Gr. τετρα-, four, + καυλός, stem, + ὀδούς, tooth.] A genus of mastodons. See Mastodontinæ.

Tetracera (te-tras′e-rä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), so called from the four horn-like carpels of the original species; < Gr. τετρα-, four, + κέρας, horn.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, of the family Dilleniaceæ, type of the tribe Tetracereæ. It is characterized by flowers in terminal panicles, each usually with five spreading sepals, as many petals, numerous stamens, and three to five acuminate carpels, usually shining, coriaceous, and follicular in fruit, and containing one to five seeds surrounded by a lacerate aril. There are about 40 species, widely scattered through the tropics. They are shrubby climbers, or rarely trees, smooth or rough-hairy, with parallel feather-veined leaves and the panicles mostly yellow and loosely many-flowered. Several species are sometimes cultivated as greenhouse climbers; several are used as astringents, as the decoction of T. oblongata in Brazil, and in Cayenne the infusion of T. aspera, the tigarea, or red creeper. T. alnifolia, the water-tree of Sierra Leone, is so named from the clear water obtained by cutting its climbing stems.

Tetraceras (te-tras′e-ras), n. [NL. (Hamilton Smith, 1827), also Tetraceros, Tetracerus, < Gr. τετρακέρως, four-horned, < τετρα-, four, + κέρας, horn.] A genus of four-horned Bovidæ, as T. quadricornis, an Indian antelope. The female is hornless. See cut under ravine-deer.

Tetracerata (tet-ra-ser′a-tä), n. pl. [NL., pl. of tetraceras:* see Tetraceras.] One of two families of De Blainville's (1825) polybranchiate Paracephalophora, consisting of various genera, not all of which were properly grouped together. They are mostly nudibranchiate or notobranchiate gastropods. The family is contrasted with Dicerata. Also Tetracera.

tetracerous (te-tras′e-rus), a. [< Gr. τετρακέρως, four-horned, < τετρα-, four, + κέρας, horn.] In conch., having four horns or feelers, as a snail.

Tetracha (tet′ra-kä), n. [NL. (Hope, 1838), < Gr. τέτραχα, in four parts, < τετρα-, four.] A notable genus of tiger-beetles, of the family Cicindelidæ, comprising about 50 species, mainly South American and West Indian, a few, however, inhabiting Australia, North America, southern Europe, and northern Africa. They have the hind coxæ contiguous, the eyes large and prominent, and the third joint of the maxillary palpi longer than the fourth. T. carolina and T. virginica, two large handsome metallic beetles, are found in the United States; the latter is crepuscular, and both are noted enemies of certain injurious larvæ. See cut under tiger-beetle.

tetrachænium (tet-ra-kē′ni-um), n.; pl. tetrachænia (-ä). [Also tetrachenium; < Gr. τετρα-, four, + χαίνειν, open.] In bot., a fruit formed by the separating of a single ovary into four nuts, as in the Labiatæ. Henslow. [Rare.]

Tetrachætæ (tet-ra-kē′tē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of tetrachætus:* see tetrachætous.] A division of brachycerous Diptera, containing those flies which are tetrachætous: correlated with Dichætæ and Hexachætæ.

tetrachætous (tet-ra-kē′tus), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + χαίτη, mane: see chæta.] Having the haustellum composed of four (not of two or six) pieces, as a fly; of or pertaining to that division of brachycerous dipterous insects whose haustellum is of this character: correlated with dichætous and hexachætous. See cuts under Syrphus and Milesia.

tetrachirus (tet-ra-kī′rus), n.; pl. tetrachiri (-rī). [NL., < Gr. τετράχειρ, four-handed, < τετρα-, four, + χείρ, hand.] In teratol., a monster with four hands.

tetrachord (tet′ra-kôrd), n. [= F. tétracorde, < Gr. τετράχορδος, having four strings, < τετρα-, four, + χορδή, a string, chord: see chord.] In music: (a) An instrument with four strings.—(b) The interval of a perfect fourth. (c) A diatonic series of four tones, the first and last of which are separated by a perfect fourth. The tetrachord was the unit of analysis in ancient music, like the hexachord in early medieval music, or the octave in modern music. It is asserted that originally the term was applied to a series consisting of a given tone, its octave, its fourth, and a tone a fourth below the octave (as, E, E′, A, B); but in its usual form it was a diatonic series. Three varieties were recognized, differing in the position of the semitone. The Dorian tetrachord had the semitone at the bottom, the Phrygian in the middle, and the Lydian at the top, thus:

Dorian, * ⌣ * — * — *
Phrygian, * — * ⌣ * — * Lydian, * — * — * ⌣ *

Of these the Dorian was regarded as the chief or standard. Scales were made up by adding tetrachords together. When successive tetrachords had a tone in common, they were called conjunct; when they were separated by a whole step, disjunct (thus, E–A, A–D would represent the former, and E–A, B–E′ the latter). Octave-scales were made up of two disjunct tetrachords, the separating interval being called the diazeuctic tone. (See mode[1], 7 (a).) The completed system of tones finally adopted by the Greeks embraced a total compass of two octaves, extending upward from a tone probably nearly equivalent to the second A below middle C, as tones are now named. The various tones of this system were distributed among five tetrachords, and named accordingly, as follows:

a, nete hyperbolæon; b, paranete hyperbolæon; c, trite hyperbolæon; d, nete diezeugmenon; e, paranete diezeugmenon; f, trite diezeugmenon; g, paramese; h, nete synemmenon; i, paranete synemmenon; j, trite synemmenon; k, mese; l, lichanos meson; m, parhypate meson; n, hypate meson; o, lichanos hypaton; p, parhypate hypaton; q, hypate hypaton; r, proslambanomenos. The terms hyperbolæon, diezeugmenon, synemmenon, meson, and hypaton are really genitives plural, but are sometimes loosely used as names of the tetrachords.

It should further be noted that the Greeks recognized two other varieties of tetrachords—the chromatic, consisting of two semitones and a minor third, and the enharmonic, consisting of two quarter-tones and a major third. The tetrachord is more or less recognized in modern music, the major scale being conceived of as made up of two disjunct Lydian tetrachords, and the minor scale of two disjunct tetrachords, the lower Phrygian, and the upper either Dorian (in the descending minor) or Lydian (in the ascending).

tetrachordal (tet′ra-kôr-dal), a. [< tetrachord + -al.] In music, pertaining to a tetrachord, or consisting of tetrachords: as, the tetrachordal musical theory of the Greeks.—Tetrachordal system, a name applied to one of the early forms of the tonic sol-fa system of teaching music.

tetrachordon (tet-ra-kôr′don), n. [NL.: see tetrachord.] A musical instrument in which, while it has strings and a keyboard, like the pianoforte, the tones are produced from the strings by pressing them, by means of the digitals, against a revolving cylinder of india-rubber covered with rosin. Compare harmonichord, hurdy-gurdy, and keyed violin (under keyed).

tetrachotomous (tet-ra-kot′ō-mus), a. [< Gr. τέτραχα, in four parts (< τετρα-, four), + -τομος, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] In zoöl. and bot., doubly dichotomous; arranged in four ranks or rows; quadrifarious; divided into four parts, or into sets of four; four-branched.

tetrachronous (te-trak′rō-nus), a. [< Gr. τετράχρονος, of four times, < τετρα-, four, + χρόνος, time.] In anc. pros., having a magnitude of four primary or fundamental times; tetrasemic.

tetracladine (tet-ra-klad′in), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + E. cladine.] Cladose, or branching into a number of variously shaped processes, as a caltrop or sponge-spicule of the tetraxon type. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 417.

tetracladose (tet-ra-klā′dōs), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + E. cladose.] Same as tetracladine.

tetracoccous (tet-ra-kok′us), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + κόκκος, berry.] In bot., having four cocci or carpels. See cut under coccus.

tetracolic (tet-ra-kō′lik), a. [< tetracol(on) + -ic.] In anc. pros., consisting of four cola or series.

tetracolon (tet-ra-kō′lon), n.; pl. tetracola (-lä). [LL., < Gr. τετράκωλον, neut. of τετράκωλος, < τετρα-, four, + κῶλον, a limb, a member: see colon[1].] In anc. rhet. and pros., a period consisting of four cola.

Tetracoralla (tet″ra-kō-ral′ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τετρα-, four, + κοράλλιον, coral.] A division of corals, corresponding to the Rugosa.

tetracoralline (tet-ra-kor′a-lin), a. [< Tetracoralla + -ine[1].] Of or pertaining to the Tetracoralla; rugose, as a stone-coral. See Cyathaxoniidæ.

tetract (tet′rakt), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + ἀκτίς, a ray, beam.] Having four rays, as a sponge-spicule; quadriradiate. See cut under sponge-spicule.

tetractinal (te-trak′ti-nal), a. [< tetractine + -al.] Having four rays, as a sponge-spicule.

tetractine (te-trak′tin), a. [As tetract + -ine[1].] Having four rays, or being quadriradiate, as a sponge-spicule.

tetractinellid (te-trak-ti-nel′id), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Tetractinellida, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Tetractinellida.

Tetractinellida (te-trak-ti-nel′i-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τετρα-, four, + ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), ray, + -ella + -ida: see tetract.] In Sollas's classification of sponges, the second tribe of Silicispongiæ, contrasted with Monaxonida, including those Demospongiæ which possess quadriradiate or triæne spicules or lithistid sclereś. It includes the great majority of existing sponges, and is divided into Choristida and Lithistida.

tetractinellidan (te-trak-ti-nel′i-dan), a. [< Tetractinellida + -an.] Same as tetractinellid.

tetractinelline (te-trak-ti-nel′in), a. [< Tetractinell(ida) + -ine[1].] Same as tetractinellid.

tetractomy (te-trak′tō-mi), n. [Properly tetrachotomy* (cf. dichotomy, tetrachotomous), < Gr. τέτραχα, in four parts, + -τομία, a cutting, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] A division into four parts.

The one key to St. Paul's meaning is the principle that, besides body and soul—which make up man's natural being—regenerated man possesses spirit, the principle of supernatural life. This has been somewhat unfairly called Bull's theory, and accused of making up a tetractomy—body, soul, spirit, and Holy Spirit.
Speaker's Commentary, 1 Thes. v. 23.

tetracyclic (tet-ra-sik′lik), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + κύκλος, ring.] In bot., having four circles or whorls of floral organs: said of flowers.

tetrad (tet′rad), n. [< Gr. τετράς (-αδ-), the number four, < τετρα-, four: see tetra-.] 1. The number four; also, a collection of four things. Also quadrad.—2. In chem., an atom the equivalence of which is four, or an element one atom of which is equivalent, in saturating power, to four atoms of hydrogen.—3. In morphology, a quaternary unit of organization resulting from individuation or integration of an aggregate of triads. See triad, dyad.

tetradactyl, tetradactyle (tet-ra-dak′til), a. and n. [< Gr. τετραδάκτυλος, having four fingers or toes, < τετρα-, four, + δάκτυλος, a finger, toe: see dactyl.] I. a. Having four fingers or toes; quadridigitate: noting either (a) the fore feet or the hind feet of a quadruped, or (b) a four-toed bird, or (c) a quadruped only (when four-toed before and behind).

II. n. A four-toed animal.

tetradactylity (tet″ra-dak-til′i-ti), n. [< tetradactyl + -ity.] Tetradactyl character or state. Nature, XLIII. 329.

tetradactylous (tet-ra-dak′ti-lus), a. [< tetradactyl + -ous.] Same as tetradactyl.

tetrad-deme (tet′rad-dēm), n. A colony or aggregate of undifferentiated tetrads. See triad-deme, dyad-deme. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 843.

tetradecapod (tet-ra-dek′a-pod), a. and n. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + δέκα, ten, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] I. a. Having fourteen feet; of or pertaining to the Tetradecapoda.

II. n. A member of the Tetradecapoda.

Tetradecapoda (tet″ra-de-kap′ō-dä), n. pl. [NL.: see tetradecapod.] Fourteen-footed crustaceans; an order of Crustacea corresponding to Arthrostraca. The multiarticulate cephalothorax has seven thoracic segments, each of which bears a pair of legs. The order includes the isopods and amphipods.

tetradecapodous (tet″ra-de-kap′ō-dus), a. [< tetradecapod + -ous.] Same as tetradecapod.

tetradiapason (tet″ra-dī-a-pā′zon), n. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + E. diapason.] In music, the interval of four octaves, or a twenty-ninth. Also called quadruple diapason, quadruple octave, and quadruple eighth.

tetradic (te-trad′ik), a. [= OF. tetradique; < LGr. τετραδικός, tetradic, < Gr. τετράς (-αδ-), a tetrad.] 1. In anc. pros.: (a) Comprising four different rhythms or meters: as, the tetradic epiploce. (b) Consisting of pericopes, or groups of systems each of which contains four unlike systems: as, a tetradic poem.—2. Of or pertaining to a tetrad. Also tetratomic.

tetradite (tet′ra-dīt), n. [< tetrad + *-ite*².] One who has some special relation to the number four. (a) One who regarded four as a mystic number. (b) Among the ancients, a child born in the fourth month or on the fourth day of the month. (c) In eccles. hist., one who reverences four gods in the godhead. (d) [cap.] A Quartodeciman.

tetradrachm (tet′ra-dram), n. [< L. tetradrachmum, < Gr. τετράδραχμον, a piece of four drachmas, < τετρα-, four, + δραχμή, a drachma: see drachma.] A silver coin of ancient Greece, of the value of four drachmas. See drachma.

Silver tetradrachms of Ænos. R. P. Knight.

Obverse.

Tetradrachm of Athens, about 220–196 B. C.—British Museum. (Size of the original.)

tetradymite (te-trad′i-mīt), n. [< Gr. τετράδυμος, fourfold, + *-ite*².] Native bismuth telluride, containing also some sulphur, a mineral occurring in foliated masses of a pale steel-gray color and brilliant metallic luster. Also called telluric bismuth, tellur - bismuth, and bornine.

tetradymous (te-trad′i-mus), a. [< Gr. τετράδυμος, fourfold, < τετρα-, four: see tetra-.] In bot., having every alternate lamella shorter than the two contiguous to it, and one complete lamella terminating a set of every four pairs of short and long: said of an agaric; also, having four cells or cases combined. Henslow.

Tetradynamia (tet″ra-di-nā′mi-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τετρα-, four, + δύναμις, power, strength.] The fifteenth class in the Linnean system, comprehending those plants which bear hermaphrodite flowers with six stamens, four of them longer than the other two. It was divided into 2 orders—Siliculosa, of which the common garden-cress and shepherd's-purse are examples, and Siliquosa, of which the mustard and cabbage are examples. All the plants of this class are now included in the family Brassicaceæ.

tetradynamian (tet″ra-di-nā′mi-an), a. [< Tetradynamia + -an.] In bot., having the characters of the Tetradynamia; tetradynamous.

tetradynamous (tet-ra-din′a-mus), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + δύναμις, power. Cf. Tetradynamia.] Having six stamens, four longer arranged in opposite pairs, and two shorter, inserted lower down: a relation found only in the flowers of Brassicaceæ. See cut under stamen.

tetraëdral, tetraëdron (tet-ra-ē′dral, -dron). Same as tetrahedral, tetrahedron.

Tetragameliæ (tet″ra-ga-mē′li-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τετρα-, four, + γαμήλιος, of a wedding, < γάμος, a wedding.] A division of rhizostomatous discomedusans having the four subgenital pouches distinct: opposed to Monogameliæ.

tetragamelian (tet″ra-ga-mē′li-an), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Tetragameliæ.

tetragamy (te-trag′a-mi), n. [< MGr. τετραγαμία, the marrying a fourth time, < *τετράγαμος, one who has married four times, < Gr. τετρα-, four, + γάμος, marriage. Cf. digamy.] A fourth marriage; marriage for the fourth time. [Rare.]

He [Symeon Magister] says that the lawfulness of tetragamy was believed to have been revealed to Euthymius. Robertson, Hist. Christ. Church, IV. 3.

tetragenous (te-traj′e-nus), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + -γενής, < γίγνεσθαι, be born: see -gen, -genous.] In bacteriology, giving rise to square groups of four, as micrococci which divide in two planes at right angles, and whose newly formed cells remain attached to one another. In investigating the etiology of tuberculosis, R. Koch found in a cavity of the lungs, in a case of phthisis, a peculiar micrococcus in square groups of four, enveloped in a transparent capsule. This micrococcus was named Micrococcus tetragenus (whence the term tetragenous).

The constituents of the colony turned out to be a tetragenous microbe quite distinct from the plain atmospheric micrococcus with which he had thought it could be identified. Science, XI. 283.

tetragon (tet′ra-gon), n. [< F. tétragone = Sp. tetrágono = Pg. It. tetragono, < L. tetragonum, a square, < Gr. τετράγωνος, four-cornered, square, neut. τετράγωνον, a square, < τετρα-, four, + γωνία, angle, corner.] 1. In geom., a figure having four angles; a quadrangle; a quadrilateral.—2. In astrol., an aspect of two planets with regard to the earth when they are distant from each other 90°, or the fourth part of a circle; quartile aspect; square.

tetragonal (te-trag′ō-nal), a. [< tetragon + -al.] 1. In geom., pertaining to a tetragon; having four angles or sides.—2. In bot. and zoöl., four-angled; having four longitudinal angles.—3. Square; quartile. Sir T. Browne.—Tetragonal spheroid, a tetrahedron with isosceles faces.—Tetragonal stem, a stem that has four sides, as in many Labiatæ.—Tetragonal system, in crystal., that system in which the three axes are at right angles to each other, but the two equal lateral axes differ in length from the vertical axis. See crystallography. Also dimetric, quadratic, monodimetric, etc.

tetragonel (te-trag′ō-nel), a. [Heraldic F.: see tetragonal.] In her., represented as a four-sided solid shown in perspective: thus, a pyramid is distinguished from a pile or point by being represented in perspective, two sides showing, and is often blazoned a tetragonel pyramid.

Tetragonia (tet-ra-gō′ni-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1735), < Gr. τετραγωνία, the spindle-tree (so called from its square fruit), < τετράγωνος, square: see tetragon.] A genus of plants, of the family Aizoaceæ, tribe Mesembryanthemeæ, distinguished from Mesembryanthemum, another genus of its tribe, by its apetalous flowers. It includes about 60 species, mainly natives of the Cape of Good Hope, with others in eastern Asia, Australia, and South America. They are somewhat fleshy herbs or undershrubs with weak or prostrate stems, bearing alternate entire leaves, and axillary greenish-yellow or reddish flowers. The fruit is a drupe or nut, often prominently winged, angled, or horned, containing a bony stone with from one to nine one-seeded cells. By Lindley the genus was made the type of a family called Tetragoniaceæ. See Australian and New Zealand spinach (under spinach).

tetragonism† (te-trag′ō-nizm), n. [NL. tetragonismus (John Bernoulli, 1696), < tetragon + -ism.] The quadrature of any curve.

Tetragonops (tet-ra-gō′nops), n. [NL. (Sir W. Jardine, 1855), < Gr. τετράγωνος, square, + ὄψ, face.] A remarkable genus of scansorial barbets, belonging to the American Capitoninæ. It is characterized by the peculiar metagnathism of the beak, the under mandible having two angular points which overlap the tip of the upper. There are 2 species, T. rhamphastinus of Ecuador and T. frantzi of Costa Rica. The former, named from some suggestiveness of a toucan, is singularly variegated with black, white, ashy, golden-brown, orange-red, and scarlet.

Tetragonops rhamphastinus.

tetragonous (te-trag′ō-nus), a. [< tetragon + ★-ous.] Same as tetragonal.

tetragram (tet′ra-gram), n. [< Gr. τετράγραμμον, a word of four letters (not found in the sense of 'a figure of four lines'), < τετρα-, four, + γράμμα, a line, letter: see *gram*².] 1. A word of four letters.—2. In geom., a figure formed by four right lines.

Tetragrammaton (tet-ra-gram′a-ton), n. [< Gr. τὸ τετραγράμματον, a word of four letters, < τετραγράμματος, of four letters: see tetragram.] A complex of four letters: applied to the mystic name JeHoVaH (see Jehovah) as written with four Hebrew letters, and sometimes transferred to other similar combinations.

When God the Father was pleased to pour forth all his glories, and imprint them upon his holy Son in his exaltation, it was by giving him his holy name, the Tetragrammaton, or Jehovah made articulate. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 744.

It follows from all this that the true representative of the Tetragrammaton is the name itself, whether the form preferred be Jahveh, or the venerable and euphonious Jehovah. Nineteenth Century, XX. 97.

tetragyn (tet′ra-jin), n. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + γυνή, a female (in mod. bot. a pistil).] In bot., a hermaphrodite plant having four pistils; a plant of the Linnean order Tetragynia.

Tetragynia (tet-ra-jin′i-ä), n. pl. [NL.: see tetragyn.] An order of plants in any of the first thirteen classes in the Linnean system, comprehending those plants which have four styles, as the holly.

tetragynian (tet-ra-jin′i-an), a. [< tetragyn + -ian.] In bot., having the characters of the Tetragynia; tetragynous.

tetragynous (te-traj′i-nus), a. [< tetragyn + ★-ous.] Having a gynœcium of four carpels.

tetrahedral (tet-ra-hē′dral), a. [Also tetraëdral; < tetrahedron + -al.] 1. Pertaining to a tetrahedron.—2. In crystal.: (a) Having the form of the regular tetrahedron. (b) Pertaining or relating to a tetrahedron, or to the system of forms to which the tetrahedron belongs: as, tetrahedral hemihedrism (see hemihedrism).—Tetrahedral angle, in geom., a solid angle bounded or inclosed by four plane angles.—Tetrahedral coördinates. See coördinate.—Tetrahedral garnet, helvite: so called because, while related to garnet in composition, it occurs in tetrahedral crystals.—Tetrahedral group. See *group*¹.

tetrahedrally (tet-ra-hē′dral-i), adv. In a tetrahedral form. Also tetraëdrally.

tetrahedrite (tet-ra-hē′drīt), n. [< tetrahedron + *-ite*².] A mineral often occurring in tetrahedral crystals (whence the name), also massive, of an iron-black color and brilliant metallic luster. It is essentially a sulphid of copper and antimony, but the antimony may be replaced by arsenic or less frequently by bismuth, and the copper may be replaced by silver (in the variety freibergite), mercury (in the variety schwatzite), also iron, zinc, lead, and in small amounts cobalt and nickel. It is commonly called Fahlerz in Germany (whence the English fahl-ore). It is sometimes an ★important silver ore.

tetrahedroid (tet-ra-hē′droid), n. [< tetrahedron + -oid.] A quartic surface the envelop of a quadric surface touching eight given lines; a surface obtained by a homographic transformation of the wave-surface; a Kummer's surface whose sixteen nodes lie in fours upon the faces of a tetrahedron through whose summits the sixteen double planes pass by fours; a quartic surface cut by each of the planes of a tetrahedron in pairs of conics in respect to which the three summits in this plane are conjugate points, and such that one of the points of intersection of the conics (and therefore all) is a node ★of the surface: so named by Cayley in 1846.

tetrahedron (tet-ra-hē′dron), n.; pl. tetrahedra, tetrahedrons (-drä, -dronz). [Also tetraëdron; = F. tétraèdre = Sp. Pg. tetraedro, < Gr. τετρα-, four, + ἕδρα, seat, base.] A solid comprehended under four plane faces; especially, the regular tetrahedron, or triangular pyramid having its base and sides equilateral triangles. In crystallography and in geometry the tetrahedron is regarded as a hemihedral form of the octahedron, four of whose faces form the plus, and the four alternate faces (two above and two below) the minus tetrahedron. The figures represent the tetrahedron in the position required to exhibit its relation to the octahedron. See hemihedral.—Orthogonal tetrahedron, a tetrahedron the pairs of whose opposite edges are at right angles—in other words, the planes through these edges and the shortest line between them are at right angles. Such a tetrahedron is distinguished by having an orthocenter.—Polar tetrahedron, a tetrahedron the planes of which are the polars of the vertices of another tetrahedron.—Tetrahedron of Möbius, one of a pair of tetrahedra each inscribed in the other.—Truncated tetrahedron, a solid formed by cutting off each corner of a tetrahedron by a plane parallel to the opposite face to such an extent as to leave the faces regular hexagons. At the truncated parts there are regular triangles. It is one of the thirteen Archimedean solids.

tetrahexahedral (tet-ra-hek-sa-hē′dral), a. [< tetrahexahedron + -al.] Having the form of a tetrahexahedron. Also tetrakishexahedral.

tetrahexahedron (tet-ra-hek-sa-hē′dron), n. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + ἕξ, six, + ἕδρα, seat, base (see hexahedron).] A solid bounded by twenty-four equal triangular faces, four corresponding to each face of the cube. In crystallography this solid belongs to the isometric system. In geometry the name is especially applied to that variety in which all the adjacent faces are equally inclined to one another. Also called tetrakishexahedron, and sometimes fluoroid, as being a form common with fluor-spar.

Tetrahexahedron.

tetrakishexahedron (tet″ra-kis-hek-sa-hē′dron), n. [< Gr. τετράκις, τετράκι, four times, + E. hexahedron.] Same as tetrahexahedron.

tetralemma (tet-ra-lem′ä), n. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + λῆμμα, a proposition: see lemma.] A dilemma in which four different possibilities are considered.

tetralogy (te-tral′ō-ji), n. [= F. tétralogie, < Gr. τετραλογία, a group of four dramas, < τετρα-, four, + λόγος, speech.] A group of four dramatic compositions, three tragic and one satyric, which were exhibited in connection on the Athenian stage for the prize at the festivals of Bacchus. The term has been extended to a group of four operatic works treating of related themes, and intended to be performed in connection.

tetralophodont (tet-ra-lof′ō-dont), a. [NL., < Gr. τετρα-, four, + λόφος, ridge, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] Having that dentition which is characteristic of the true mastodons, whose molars are four-ridged.

tetramastigate (tet-ra-mas′ti-gāt), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + μάστιξ (μαστιγ-), a whip, + -ate[1].] Having four flagella, as a protozoan.

Tetrameles (te-tram′e-lēz), n. [NL. (Robert Brown, 1826), from its 4-merous flowers; < Gr. τέτρα, four, + μέλος, a limb, member.] A genus of plants, of the family Datiscaceæ, characterized by apetalous dicœcious flowers, with four calyx-lobes and four elongated stamens or four styles. The only species, T. nudiflora, is a native of India, Ceylon, and Java. It is a tall tree and bears broad long-petioled deciduous leaves, preceded by numerous small flowers in long and slender panicled racemes. It is known in India as jungle-bendy, and in Java as weenong-tree.

Tetramera (te-tram′e-rä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tetramerus: see tetramerous.] In entom.: (a) In Latreille's system, a division of Coleoptera, containing those beetles all of whose tarsi are usually or apparently tetramerous or four-jointed. Also called Cryptopentamera and Pseudotetramera. (b) A prime division of the hymenopterous family Chalcididæ, comprising six subfamilies in which the tarsi are four-jointed.

1, Lamia aurocincta; 2, 3, enlarged tarsi of other Tetramera.

tetrameral (te-tram′e-ral), a. [< tetramer-ous + -al.] Four-parted; having parts in fours; tetramerous, as a polyp; of or pertaining to the Tetrameralia.

Tetrameralia (te-tram-e-rā′li-ä), n. pl. [NL.: see tetrameral.] The tetrameral polyps, as a subclass of scyphomedusans distinguished from Octomeralia, and composed of the three orders Calycozoa, Peromedusæ, and Cubomedusæ.

tetramerism (te-tram′e-rizm), n. [< tetramer(ous) + -ism.] In zoöl. and bot., division into four parts, or the state of being so divided; four-partedness. Amer. Nat., XXII. 941.

tetramerous (te-tram′e-rus), a. [< NL. tetramerus, < Gr. τετραμερής, four-parted, < τετρα-, four, + μέρος, part.] Consisting of or divided into four parts; characterized by having four parts. Specifically—(a) In bot., having the parts in fours: as, a tetramerous flower (that is, one having four members in each of the floral whorls). It is frequently written 4-merous. (b) In zoöl.: (1) Four-parted: especially noting an actinozoan having the radiating parts or organs arranged in fours or multiples of four. Compare hexamerous. (2) In entomology, having four joints, as the tarsus of an insect; having four-jointed tarsi, as a beetle or chalcid; of or pertaining to the Tetramera. See cuts under Phytophaga and Tetramera.

tetrameter (te-tram′e-tėr), a. and n. [< LL. tetrametrus, < Gr. τετράμετρος, having four measures, neut. τετράμετρον, a verse of four measures, < τετρα-, four, + μέτρον, measure.] I. a. Having four measures.

II. n. In pros., a verse or period consisting of four measures. A trochaic, iambic, or anapestic tetrameter consists of four dipodies (eight feet). A tetrameter of other rhythms is a tetrapody, or period of four feet. The name is specifically given to the trochaic tetrameter catalectic. An example of the acatalectic tetrameter is tetramorph (tet′ra-môrf), n. [< Gr. τετράμορφος, four-shaped, fourfold, < τετρα-, four, + μορφή, form.] In Christian art, the union of the four attributes of the evangelists in one figure, winged, and standing on winged fiery wheels, the wings being covered with eyes. It is the type of unparalleled velocity. Fairholt.

Once upon a | midnight dreary, ‖ as I pondered | weak and weary. Poe, The Raven.

tetrander (te-tran′dėr), n. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + ἀνήρ (ἀνδρ-), male (in mod. bot. a stamen).] In bot., a hermaphrodite plant having four free, equal, distinct stamens.

Tetrandria.—Galium Aparine.

Tetrandria (te-tran′dri-ä), n. pl. [NL.: see tetrander.] The fourth class of plants in the Linnean system, comprehending hermaphrodite plants having four free, distinct, and equal stamens. The orders belonging to this class are Monogynia, Digynia, Tetragynia. The teazel, dodder, bedstraw, and pond-weed are examples.

tetrandrian (te-tran′dri-an), a. [< tetrander + -ian.] In bot., tetrandrous.

tetrandrous (te-tran′drus), a. [< tetrander + -ous.] In bot., having four stamens; characteristic of the class Tetrandria.

tetrant (tet′rant), n. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + -ant.] A quadrant. Weale. [Rare.]

Tetranychidæ (tet-ra-nik′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tetranychus + -idæ.] A family of mites, containing those forms known as spinning-mites, and founded on the genus Tetranychus. In common with the Trombidiidæ or harvest-mites, the Tetranychidæ have an appendiculate terminal palpal joint, but are smaller and more highly colored than the harvest-mites, and are plant-feeders exclusively. Next to Tetranychus, Bryobia is the most noticeable genus. B. pratensis frequently enters houses in the United States in enormous numbers in the fall.

Tetranychus (te-tran′i-kus), n. [NL. (Dufour, 1832), prop. Tetraonychus, < Gr. τετρα-, four, + ὄνυξ (ὀνυχ-), claw.] A very large and widespread genus of spinning-mites, having legs with seven joints, the feet short and curved, and the mouth with a barbed sucking-apparatus. It contains minute yellowish or reddish species, most of which spin more or less of a web on the under side of leaves, and are noted as injurious to vegetation. The so-called red-spider, a cosmopolitan hothouse pest, is T. telarius.

Tetrao (tet′rā-ō), n. [NL., < L. tetrao, < Gr. τετράων, a pheasant, a grouse.] The leading genus of Tetraonidæ, formerly including all the grouse, but subsequently variously restricted, now to the capercaillie, T. urogallus, and some closely related species. See cut under capercaillie.

tetraodion (tet-ra-ō′di-on), n. [< MGr. τετραῴδιον, < Gr. τετρα-, four, + ᾠδή, ode.] In the Gr. Ch., a canon of four odes.

Tetraodon, tetraodont, etc. See Tetrodon, etc.

Tetraogallus (tet″rā-ō-gal′us), n. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1833–4), < L. tetrao, a grouse, + gallus, cock.] A genus of snow-partridges. These birds are near relatives of Lerva nivicola, another species of snow-partridge (see Lerva); they are indifferently known as snow-pheasants, snow-cocks, and snow-chukors, one of them being also specified as the chourtka. This is T. caspius; three other species are named—T. himalayensis, T. altaicus, and T. tibetanus. The whole range of the genus is from Asia Minor to western China, but only in mountain-ranges at altitudes up to 18,000 feet. In some respects the genus approaches Tetraophasis (which see). The size is large, the males attaining a length of two feet or more; the sexes are nearly alike in plumage, which is of varied dark coloration. The birds frequent open rocky places, generally in flocks, and nest on the ground, laying 6 to 9 eggs of an olive color with reddish spots. Also called Chourtka.

Snow-partridge (Tetraogallus himalayensis).

tetraonid (tet′rā-ō-nid), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Tetraonidæ, or grouse family.

II. n. Any grouse, or other member of the Tetraonidæ.

Tetraonidæ (tet-rā-on′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tetrao(n-) + -idæ.] A family of gallinaceous birds, of the order Gallinæ, of which the type is the genus Tetrao; the grouse family, having the tarsi and nasal fossæ more or less completely feathered. The leading genera besides Tetrao are Lyrurus, Canace (or Dendragapus), Falcipennis, Lagopus, Centrocercus, Pediœcetes, Cupidonia (or Tympanuchus), and Bonasa. They are confined to the northern hemisphere, and include, besides the birds usually called grouse, the capercaillie, prairie-hen, sage-cock, ptarmigan, and others. The family has been used in a more comprehensive sense, including then an indefinite number of genera of partridges, quails, and similar birds. See cuts under blackcock, Bonasa, Canace, capercaillie, Centrocercus, Cupidonia, grouse, Oreortyx, partridge, Pediœcetes, and ptarmigan.

Tetraoninæ (tet″rā-ō-nī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Tetrao(n-), a grouse, + -inæ.] The grouse family, Tetraonidæ, rated as a subfamily of gallinaceous birds, or a restricted division of that family in its widest sense.

tetraonine (tet′rā-ō-nin), a. Of or pertaining to the Tetraoninæ.

The true Gallinæ offer two types of structure, "one of which may be called Galline, and the other Tetraonine." Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 333.

Tetraonomorphæ (tet″rā-ō-nō-môr′fē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τετράων, a grouse, + μορφή, form.] In Sundevall's system of ornithological classification, a cohort of Gallinæ, consisting of the sand-grouse (Pteroclidæ) and grouse proper (Tetraonidæ).

Tetraonychidæ, Tetraonychus. More correct forms of Tetranychidæ, Tetranychus.

Tetraoperdix (tet″rā-ō-pėr′diks), n. [NL., < Gr. τετράων, a grouse, + πέρδιξ, a partridge.] In ornith., same as Lerva.

Tetraophasis (tet-rā-of′ā-sis), n. [NL. (Jules Verreaux, 1870), < Gr. τετράων, a grouse, + Φᾶσις, the river Phasis, with ref. to φασιανός, pheasant: see pheasant.] A genus of gallinaceous birds peculiar to Tibet, with one species, T. obscurus, in some respects intermediate between pheasants and grouse. It is about 20 inches long, and of dark-brown and -gray colors, alike in both sexes.

tetrapetalous (tet-ra-pet′a-lus), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + πέταλον, leaf (petal).] In bot., having four petals.

tetrapharmacon (tet-ra-fär′ma-kon), n. [NL., also tetrapharmacum; < Gr. τετραφάρμακον, a compound of wax, resin, lard, and pitch, neut. of τετραφάρμακος, compounded of four drugs, < τετρα-, four, + φάρμακον, drug: see pharmacon.] An ointment composed of wax, resin, lard, and pitch.

tetrapharmacum (tet-ra-fär′ma-kum), n. Same as tetrapharmacon.

tetraphony (tet′ra-fō-ni), n. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + φωνή, voice.] In early medieval music, diaphony for four voices.

Tetraphyllidea (tet″ra-fi-lid′ē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τετρα-, four, + φύλλον, a leaf.] A family of Cestoidea, including tapeworms of various sharks, in which the head is furnished with four lobes, suckers, or tentacles, or in any way distinguished by fours into sets of parts or organs. The group includes Phyllobothrium, Echineibothrium, and Anthobothrium.

tetraphyllidean (tet″ra-fi-lid′ē-an), a. Of or belonging to the Tetraphyllidea.

tetraphyllous (tet-ra-fil′us), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + φύλλον, a leaf.] In bot., four-leaved; consisting of four distinct leaves or leaflets.

Tetrapla (tet′ra-plä), n. [< Gr. τετραπλᾶ, neut. pl. of τετραπλόος, τετραπλοῦς, fourfold, < τετρα-, four, + -πλοος, -fold.] An edition of the Bible in four versions. The name is specially given to a work by Origen, containing the Greek versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion and the Septuagint. Compare Hexapla, Octapla.

Tetrapleura (tet-ra-plö′rä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τετρα-, four, + πλευρόν, a rib.] Those organic forms which are tetrapleural: distinguished from Dipleura.

tetrapleural (tet-ra-plö'ral), a. [As Tetrapleura + -al.] In promorphology, zygopleural with four antimeres. Haeckel.

Tetrapneumona (tet-rap-nū'mō-nä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tetrapneumonus:* see tetrapneumonous.] 1. A division of Araneina, or true spiders, having four lungs, four spinnerets, and eight approximated ocelli: distinguished from Dipneumones. It consists of the mygalids or therapho ses, the bird-spiders of South America, the tarantulas of North America, and the trap-door spiders. Also Tetrapneumones.

2. A group of holothurians, represented by the genus Rhopalodina, having four water-lungs (whence the name). Schmarda. Also called Decacrenidia, Diplostomidea, and Rhopalodinæ.

tetrapneumonian (tet″rap-nū-mō'ni-an), a. and n. [< tetrapneumon-ous + -ian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Tetrapneumona.

II. n. A spider belonging to the Tetrapneumona.

tetrapneumonous (tet-rap-nū'mō-nus), a. [< NL. tetrapneumonus*, < Gr. τετρα-, four, + πνεύμων, a lung: see pneumonia.] Having four lungs. Specifically—(a) Having four water-lungs, or respiratory trees. (b) Having four lung-sacs, as a spider.

tetrapod (tet'ra-pod), a. and n. [< Gr. τετράπους (-ποδ-), also τετράποδης, four-footed, < τετρα-, four, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] I. a. Four-footed; quadruped; specifically, having only four perfect legs, as certain butterflies; of or pertaining to the Tetrapoda.

II. n. A four-footed animal; a quadruped; ★specifically, a member of the Tetrapoda.

Tetrapoda (te-trap'ō-dä), n. pl. [NL.: see tetrapod.] In entom., a division of butterflies having the first pair of legs more or less reduced and folded, not fitted for walking.

tetrapodichnite (tet-ra-pō-dik'nīt), n. [< NL. Tetrapodichnites, < Gr. τετράπους, four-footed (see tetrapod), + ἴχνος, a track, footstep: see ichnite.] In geol., the footprint of a four-footed animal, as a saurian reptile, left on a rock. See ichnite.

Tetrapodichnites (tet-ra-pod-ik-nī'tēz), n. [NL. (Hitchcock): see tetrapodichnite.] A hypothetical genus of animals whose tracks are known as tetrapodichnites.

tetrapodous (te-trap'ō-dus), a. [< tetrapod + -ous.] Same as tetrapod.

tetrapody (te-trap'ō-di), n. [< Gr. τετραποδία, a measure or length of four feet, in pros. a tetrapody, < τετράπους, having four feet: see tetrapod.] A group of four feet; a colon, meter, or verse consisting of four feet. Amer. Jour. Philol., X. 225.

tetrapolis (te-trap'ō-lis), n. [< Gr. τετράπολις, a district having four cities, prop. adj., having four cities, < τετρα-, four, + πόλις, a city.] A group or association of four towns; a district or political division characterized by containing four important cities. See tetrapolitan.

"The garden opposite Euboia's coast" was inhabited by the Apolline Tetrapolis.
Harrison and Verrall, Ancient Athens, p. xcvii.

tetrapolitan (tet-ra-pol'i-tan), a. [< NL. tetrapolitanus, < tetrapolis, a group of four cities: see tetrapolis.] Of or belonging to a tetrapolis, or group of four towns; specifically [cap.], relating to the four towns of Constance, Lindau, Memmingen, and Strasburg.—Tetrapolitan Confession, a confession of faith presented at the Diet of Augsburg in 1530 by the representatives of the four cities named above. It resembled the Augsburg Confession, but inclined somewhat to Zwinglian views.

tetraprostyle (tet-ra-prō'stil), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + πρόστυλος, with pillars in front: see prostyle.] Noting a classical temple having a portico of four columns in front of the cella or naos.

tetrapteran (te-trap'te-ran), a. and n. [< tetrapter-ous + -an.] I. a. Having four wings, as an insect; tetrapterous.

II. n. An insect which has four wings.

tetrapterous (te-trap'te-rus), a. [< Gr. τετράπτερος, four-winged, < τετρα-, four, + πτερόν, wing.] Having four wings, as a fruit or stem (see wing, 9 (c)); tetrapteran.

Tetrapteryx (te-trap'te-riks), n. [NL. (Thunberg, 1818), < Gr. τέτρα-, four, + πτέρυξ, wing.] A generic name under which the Stanley crane of South Africa has been separated from Anthropoides as T. paradiseus.

1. Tetrapterous Fruit of Mohrodendron Carolinum. 2. Same, transversely cut.

tetraptote (tet'rap-tōt), n. [< Gr. τετράπτωτος, with four cases, < τετρα-, four, + πτῶσις (πτωτ-), a case in grammar.] In gram., a noun that has four cases only.

Tetrapturus (tet-rap-tū'rus), n. [NL. (Rafinesque, 1810), for Tetrapterurus*, < Gr. τετρα-, four, + πτερόν, wing, fin, + οὐρά, tail: in allusion to the wing-like caudal keels.] A genus of Istiophoridæ, including certain sailfishes, sometimes specified as spear-fishes and bill-fishes. The type is the Mediterranean T. belone; another species is T. albidus. See cut under spear-fish, 2.

tetrapyrenous (tet″ra-pī-rē'nus), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + πυρήν, the stone of a fruit: see pyrene.] In bot., having four pyrenes or stones.

tetraquetrous (te-trak'we-trus), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + L. -quetrus, as in triquetrus, three-cornered: see triquetrous.] In bot., having four very sharp and almost winged corners, as the ★stems of some labiate plants.

tetrarch (tet'rärk or tē'trärk), n. and a. [< ME. tetrark, < OF. tetrarque, tetrarche, F. tétrarque = Sp. It. tetrarca = Pg. tetrarcha, < L. tetrarches, < Gr. τετράρχης, a leader of four companies, a tetrarch, < τετρα-, four, + ἀρχειν, rule.]

I. n. 1. In the Roman empire, the ruler of the fourth part of a country or province in the East; a viceroy; a subordinate ruler.

Herod being tetrarch of Galilee. Luke iii. 1.

2. The commander of a subdivision of a Greek phalanx.

I condemn, as every one does, his inaction after the battle of Cannæ; and, in his last engagement with Africanus, I condemn no less his bringing into the front of the center, as became some showy tetrarch rather than Hannibal, his eighty elephants, by the refractoriness of which he lost the battle.
Landor, Imag. Conv., Scipio, Polybius, and Panætius.

II.† a. Four principal or chief. [Rare and erroneous.]

tetrarchate (tet'rär-kāt), n. [< tetrarch + -ate[3].] The district governed by a Roman tetrarch, or the office or jurisdiction of a tetrarch.

tetrarchical (te-trär'ki-kal), a. [< tetrarch + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to a tetrarch or tetrarchy.

tetrarchy (tet'rär-ki), n.; pl. tetrarchies (-kiz). [= F. tétrarchie = Sp. tetrarquía = Pg. It. tetrarchia, < L. tetrarchia, < Gr. τετραρχία, the power or government of a tetrarch, < τετράρχης, a tetrarch: see tetrarch.] Same as tetrarchate.

tetrascelus (te-tras'ē-lus), n.; pl. tetrasceli (-lī). [NL., < Gr. τετρασκελής, four-legged, < τετρα-, four, + σκέλος, leg.] In teratol., a monster with four legs.

tetraschistic (tet-ra-skis'tik), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + σχίσμα, a cleft, division.] In biol., tending to divide into four parts, or marked by such division. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 834.

tetraselenodont (tet″ra-sē-lē'nō-dont), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + σελήνη, moon, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] Having four crescentic ridges, as a molar; characterized by such dentition, as a ruminant. Amer. Nat., May, 1890.

tetrasemic (tet-ra-sē'mik), a. [< LL. tetrasemus, < Gr. τετράσημος, < τετρα-, four, + σῆμα, a sign, σημεῖον, a sign, mora: see disemic.] In anc. pros., containing or equal to two semeia or moræ: as, a tetrasemic long (double the usual long); a tetrasemic foot (dactyl, anapest, spondee).

tetrasepalous (tet-ra-sep'a-lus), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + NL. sepalum, sepal.] In bot., having four sepals.

tetraspaston (tet-ra-spas'ton), n. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + σπᾶν, pull, stretch: see spasm.] A machine in which four pulleys act together. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

tetraspermous (tet-ra-spėr'mus), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + σπέρμα, seed: see sperm[1].] In bot., four-seeded; producing four seeds to each flower, or in each cell of a capsule.

tetraspherical (tet-ra-sfer'i-kal), a. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + σφαῖρα, sphere: see spherical.] Relating to four spheres.

tetrasporange (tet'ra-spō-ranj), n. [< NL. tetrasporangium.] In bot., same as tetrasporangium.

tetrasporangium (tet″ra-spō-ran'ji-um), n.; pl. tetrasporangia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. τετρα-, four, + NL. sporangium, q. v.] In bot., a sporangium or cell in which tetraspores are produced.

tetraspore (tet'ra-spōr), n. [< Gr. τετρα-, four, + σπορά, seed: see spore[2].] In bot., an asexually produced spore of the red algæ: so called from the circumstance that usually four are produced by the division of the mother-cell. See spore[2], cruciate[1], 2, bispore, Florideæ. Also called spherospore. See cut under Algæ.

tetrasporic (tet-ra-spor'ik), a. [< tetraspore + -ic.] In bot., composed of tetraspores.

tetterwort (tet'ėr-wėrt), n. The larger celandine, Chelidonium majus, so named from its use in cutaneous diseases; also, in America, sometimes the bloodroot, Sanguinaria Canadensis.

tettiga (tet'i-gä), n. Same as tettix, 1.

Tettiginæ (tet-i-jī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Tettix (-ig-) + -inæ.] A prominent subfamily of short-horned grasshoppers, or Acrididæ, containing the forms sometimes known as grouse-locusts. They are small species in which the pronotum is lengthened posteriorly into a projection as long as the wings, or longer. They are very active, and are found abundantly in low wet meadows and along watercourses. The principal genera are Tettix, Tettigidea, and Batrachedra. Also, as a family, Tettigidæ.

Tettigonia (tet-i-gō'ni-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1748), < Gr. τέττιξ (τεττιγ-), a cicada.] A very large and somewhat loosely characterized genus of leaf-hoppers, typical of the family Tettigoniidæ. The British Museum catalogue gives 127 species, from all parts of the world—largely, however, from South America.

tettigonian (tet-i-gō'ni-an), n. [< Tettigonia + -an.] A leaf-hopper of the genus Tettigonia or some related genus.

Tettigoniidæ (tet″i-gō-nī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tettigonia + -idæ.] A large and important family of leaf-hoppers, typified by the genus Tettigonia. They are small to medium-sized forms with long bodies, an expanded face, bristle-shaped antennæ placed in a cavity beneath the rim of the vertex, and ocelli upon the vertex. It is a wide-spread group, occurring most abundantly in tropical regions. Species of Proconia and Diedrocephala injure crops in the United States, and members of the former genus secrete large quantities of very liquid honeydew, producing the phenomena of so-called "weeping trees." Also Tettigoniadæ, Tettigonidæ.

tettish† (tet'ish), a. Same as teatish.

tettix (tet'iks), n. [< Gr. τέττιξ, a cicada.] 1. A cicada.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of Acrididæ, or short-horned grasshoppers, typical of the subfamily Tettiginæ, and having the pronotum horizontal and the antennæ thirteen- or fourteen-jointed. Nine species are known in the United States.

tetty† (tet'i), a. [Cf. tettish, teatish.] Techy; peevish; irritable.

II. n. One of the Teucri; one of the inhabitants of ancient Teucria, or the Troad; a Trojan.

Teucrium (tū'kri-um), n. [NL. (Rivinus, 1690; earlier in Matthioli, 1554), < L. teucrion, < Gr. τεύκριον, germander, spleenwort; appar. connected with Τεῦκρος, Teucer, and so said to have been used medicinally by Teucer, first king of Troy.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, of the family Menthaceæ and tribe Ajugeæ. It is characterized by flowers with a short corolla-tube, a prominent lower lip, the other lobes small and inconspicuous, and the four stamens far exserted from a posterior fissure. It includes about 100 species, scattered over many temperate and warm regions, especially near the Mediterranean. They are herbs or shrubs of varied habit; the leaves are either entire, toothed, or cut, and the flowers are in axillary clusters, or terminal spikes, racemes, or heads. The species are known in general as germander (which see, and compare poly, and herb mastic, under herb). England has 4 and the United States 7 different species, of which T. Canadense, the common American germander, of low open ground and fence-rows from Canada to Texas and Mexico, bears an erect spike of rather conspicuous reddish-purple flowers. T. littorale occurs on or near the coast from Maine to Florida, one is confined to the Gulf States, and three others occur only in the Northeastern States, while T. occidentale extends from Ontario to British Columbia and southward. Many species were once highly esteemed in medicine, but are now discarded; especially the three following, which are widely dispersed through Europe and Asia: T. Chamædrys, the wall-germander, once used for rheumatism and as a febrifuge; T. Scordium, the water-germander, a creeping marsh-plant with the odor of garlic when bruised, once used as an antiseptic, etc.; and T. Scorodonia, the wood-, garlic-, or mountain-sage, a very bitter plant resembling hops in taste and odor. (See cut under Didynamia, and compare ambrose, 2, and scordium.) Many other species have a pleasant fragrance. T. Marum, the cat-thyme, is in use for its scent, and is remarkable as a sternutatory. T. corymbosum of Australia is there known as licorice. T. betonicum, the Madeira betony, with loose spikes of fragrant crimson flowers, and several other species from Madeira, are handsome greenhouse shrubs. T. fruticans, the tree-germander of Spain, and T. racemosum, a dwarf evergreen of Australia, are also occasionally cultivated, and many annual species are showy border-plants.

Upper Part of the Flowering Stem of American Germander (Teucrium Canadense). a, a flower.

Texas blue-grass, buckthorn, cardinal, goose, grackle. See blue-grass, etc.

Texas fever, Texan fever. A specific fever affecting cattle living within a certain area, including the greater part of the southern United States, and communicated by them to cattle north of this area when the former are taken north during the warm season of the year. Cattle taken from the North into this infected area may likewise contract the disease. The disease is due to the invasion and destruction of the red blood-corpuscles by a protozoan parasite, Pyrosoma bigeminum, analogous to the malarial parasite in man. The germ is conveyed from the sick to healthy animals by the tick, Ixodes bovis. The disease begins with a high fever, which may continue from a few days to a week or more, when the animal succumbs; or the fever may subside and a slow recovery ensue. A characteristic symptom in severe cases is the presence of hemoglobin in the urine, giving it a deep port-wine color. After death the spleen is found enormously enlarged and softened, the fourth stomach inflamed, and the bile very thick.

Texas flax. A composite plant, Gutierrezia Texana, abundant on the prairies of central Texas. Its slender stem, narrow leaves, and small yellow heads give it a close superficial resemblance to flax.

Texas millet. Same as concho-grass.

Texas sarsaparilla. Same as menispermum, 2.

Texas snakeroot. See snakeroot.

textualism (teks'tū-al-izm), n. [< textual + -ism.] Strict adherence to the text.

textualist (teks'tū-al-ist), n. [< textual + -ist.] 1. One who is well versed in the Scriptures, and can readily quote texts.

How nimble textualists and grammarians for the tongue the Rabbins are, their comments can witness. Lightfoot, Miscellanies, vi.

2. One who adheres strictly to the letter of texts.

textually (teks'tū-al-i), adv. In or as regards the text; according to the text.

A copy in some parts textually exact. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 30.

textuary (teks'tū-ā-ri), a. and n. [< L. textus, + -ary.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the text; textual.

He extends the exclusion unto twenty days, which in the textuary sense is fully accomplished in one. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 16.

2†. Having the authority or importance of a text; that ranks as a text, or takes chief place; regarded as authoritative, or as an authority.

I see no ground why his reason should be textuary to ours, or that God intended him an universal headship. Glanville.

Some who have had the honour to be textuary in divinity are of opinion that it shall be the same specifical fire with ours. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. 50.

II. n.; pl. textuaries (-riz). 1. A textualist; one who adheres strictly to the text.—2†. An expounder or critic of texts; a textual expositor or critic.

In Luke xvi. 17, 18, . . . this clause against abrogating is inserted immediately before the sentence against divorce, as if it were called thither on purpose to defend the equity of this particular law against the foreseen rashness of common textuaries. Milton, Tetrachordon.

The greatest wits have been the best textuaries. Swift, To a young Poet.

textuel†, a. A Middle English form of textual.

textuist† (teks'tū-ist), n. [< L. textus, text, + -ist.] One who adheres too strictly to the letter of texts; a textualist.

When I remember the little that our Saviour could prevail about this doctrine of charity against the crabbed textuists of his time, I make no wonder. Milton, Divorce, To the Parliament.

Textularia (teks-tū-lā'ri-ä), n. [NL. (D'Orbigny, 1826), < L. textula*, dim. of textus, text, + -aria.] The typical genus of the family Textulariidæ.

textularian (teks-tū-lā'ri-an), a. and n. [< Textularia + -an.] I. a. Belonging to or having the characters of Textularia in a broad sense; textulariidean. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 458.

II. n. A textularian foraminifer.

Textularidea (teks″tū-lā-rid'ē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Textularia + -idea.] The Textulariidæ advanced to the rank of an order, and divided into Textularina, Buliminina, and Cassidulinina.

textularidean (teks″tū-lā-rid'ē-an), a. and n. [< Textularidea + -an.] I. a. Textularian in a broad sense; of or pertaining to the Textularidea.

II. n. A textularian in a broad sense.

Textulariidæ (teks″tū-lā-rī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Textularia + -idæ.] A family of perforate foraminifers, typified by the genus Textularia. The test is arenaceous or hyaline, with or without a perforate calcareous basis, and the chambers are normally arranged in two or more alternating series, or spiral and labyrinthic. Dimorphous and trimorphous forms may also be found.

textural (teks'tūr-al), a. [< texture + -al.] Of or relating to texture: as, textural differences between rocks.

It may be the result of congestion or inflammation of the nerve, . . . or of other textural changes. Quain, Med. Dict., p. 52.

texture (teks'tūr), n. [< F. texture = Pr. textura, tezura = Sp. Pg. textura = It. testura, < L. textura, a weaving, web, texture, structure, < texere, pp. textus, weave: see text.] 1†. The art or process of weaving.

God made them . . . coats of skin, which, though a natural habit unto all before the invention of texture, was something more unto Adam. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 25.

2. Anything produced by weaving; a woven or textile fabric of any sort; a web.

His high throne, which, under state
Of richest texture spread, at the upper end
Was placed in regal lustre. Milton, P. L., x. 446.

Others, apart far in the grassy dale,
. . . their humble texture weave.
Thomson, Spring, l. 641.

3. The peculiar or characteristic disposition of the threads, strands, or the like which make up a textile fabric: as, cloth of loose texture.—4. By extension, the peculiar disposition of the constituent parts of any body—its make, consistence, etc.; structure in general.

In the next place, it seems to be pretty well agreed that there is something also in the original frame or texture of every man's mind which, independently of all exterior and subsequently intervening circumstances, and even of his radical frame of body, makes him liable to be differently affected by the same exciting causes from what another man would be. Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, vi. 29.

The mind must have the pressure of incumbent duties, or it will grow lax and spongy in texture for want of it. O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 231.

When scenes are detached from the texture of a play, each scene inevitably loses something of the effect which, in the dramatist's conception, belonged to it as part of "a single action." Classical Rev., II. 248.

5. In biol., a tissue; the character or mode of formation of tissues.—6. In the fine arts, the surface quality of animate or inanimate objects, natural or artificial, which expresses to the eye the disposition and arrangement of their component tissues.—Cavernous texture. See cavernous.—Texture of rocks, the mode of aggregation of the various substances of which rocks are composed. It relates to the arrangement of their parts viewed on a smaller scale than that of their structure. The texture of rocks may be compact, earthy, granular, porphyritic, felsitic, ★vitreous, schistose, etc. See structure.

texture (teks'tūr), v. t.; pret. and pp. textured, ppr. texturing. [< texture, n.] To form a texture of or with; interweave. [Rare.]

textureless (teks'tūr-les), a. [< texture + -less.] Having no discernible structure; amorphous: as, a textureless membrane.

textury† (teks'tū-ri), a. [< texture + -y[1].] Same as texture, 1.

textus (teks'tus), n. [< L. textus, text: see text.] 1. The text of any book, especially of the Bible or of a part of it: as, the Textus Receptus (see phrase below).—2†. A book containing the liturgical gospels.

The book of the gospels, or textus, had, in general, a binding of solid gold, studded with gems, and especially pearls, and was used for being kissed; the other, the gospel-book, which served for reading out of, was often as richly adorned. Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. ii. 192.

Textus Receptus, the received text of the Greek Testament. Strictly speaking, this name belongs to the Elzevir edition of 1633, to which the printers had prefixed the statement "Textum ergo habes nunc ab omnibus receptum" (You have now therefore the text received by all). This text is founded chiefly upon Erasmus's editions. The name is, however, loosely applied to any similar text, such as that on which the authorized version of the New Testament is based. The Textus Receptus represents Greek manuscripts of late date.

textus-case (teks'tus-kās), n. A case for a textus, or book of the gospels: usually a decorative case of the middle ages, or older, as of stamped leather, silver, or silver-gilt.

text-writer (tekst'rī″tėr), n. 1†. One who, before the invention of printing, copied books for sale. Encyc. Dict.—2. A writer of textbooks and compends: as, a legal text-writer.

The notion that the extraordinary harshness of the Hindoo text-writers to widows is of sacerdotal origin. Maine, Village Communities, p. 54.

teylet†, n. See tillett.

teyl-tree (tīl'trē), n. Same as teil-tree. See teil.

teynet†, n. A Middle English variant of tain.

teyntet†, n. An occasional Middle English form of tent[1].

th. A common English digraph. See T[1].

Th. 1. An abbreviation of Thursday.—2. In ★chem., the symbol for thorium.

-th[1]. [< ME. -th, -t, -eth, < AS. -th, -t, etc., of various origin: see etymologies of words containing this formation.] A suffix used in forming abstract nouns from adjectives or verbs, as in health from whole or heal, stealth from steal, filth from foul, tilth from till, growth from grow, truth, troth, from true or trow, drouth from dry, highth from high, etc. It is little used as a modern formative, the more recent examples, like blowth, spilth, being chiefly poetical. The words in which it occurs are mostly old, and accordingly often differ somewhat, in their modern form, from the modern form of the original adjective or verb, as filth from foul, drouth from dry, etc. In many cases the relation of the noun in -th to its original verb is more remote, and is to be explained by the history of the particular word, as in death from the original form of die, ruth from rue, etc. In certain positions the -th becomes -t, and sometimes -d. Some modern forms in -t coexist with forms in -th, as drought, height, beside the now archaic drouth, highth; and in some -t has replaced the earlier -th, as in sight. In many nouns -th is of other, and often obscure, origin, as in north, south, both, etc.

-th[2]. [Also -eth; < ME. -th, -eth, -the, -ethe, < AS. -tha, -the (-o-tha), etc., = L. -tus = Gr. -τος, etc.; an adj. formative (orig. identical with the superl. suffix -t, in -es-t), used to form ordinal from cardinal numerals: see the etymologies of the ordinals concerned.] A suffix (-eth after a vowel) used in forming ordinal from cardinal numerals, as in fourth, fifth, sixth, etc., twentieth, thirtieth, hundredth, thousandth, millionth, etc. It appears as -d in third, and was formerly -t in fift, sixt, etc., now fifth, sixth, etc. In first the suffix is the superlative -st. In eighth, pronounced as if spelled eighth*, the radical t is anomalously omitted in spelling.

-th[3]. [< ME. -th, -eth, < AS. -eth, -ath, -iath = D. -t = G. -t, etc.] A suffix (in older form -eth) used in forming the third person singular (and in Middle English all persons plural) of the present indicative of verbs, as in singeth, hopeth, etc., or hath, doth, etc. It remains in archaic use, in poetical and scriptural language, the ordinary modern form being -s, -es, as in sings, hopes, has, does, etc. In Middle English and Anglo-Saxon use it was often contracted with a preceding radical d or t into -t, as jint for jindeth, sit for siteth, sitteth, etc.

tha[1]†, adv. A Middle English variant of tho[1].

tha[2]†, pron. An obsolete form of the[1] and they[1].

thaar, n. See thar[3].

thack[1] (thak), n. An obsolete or dialectal (Scotch) form of thatch.—Under thack and rape, under thatch and rope: said of stacks in the barn-yard when they are thatched in for the winter, the thatch being secured with straw ropes; hence, figuratively, snug and comfortable. [Scotch.]

thack[1] (thak), v. An obsolete or dialectal (Scotch) form of thatch.

thack[2]† (thak), v. t. [< ME. thakken, < AS. thaccian = Icel. thjökka, later also thjaka = Norw. tjaaka, strike, beat; cf. Icel. thykkr, a thump, blow. Cf. thwack and whack.] To strike; thump; thwack. Chaucer.

thack[2]†, n. [< ME. thacce: see thack[2], v.] A stroke; a thwack.

> For when thacces of anguych watz hid in my sawle, > Thenne I remembred me ryȝt of my rych lorde, thalamencephalic (thal-ą-men-se-fal'ik or -sef'ą-lik), a. [< thalamencephal + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the thalamencephalon; diencephalic.

thalamencephalon (thal″ą-men-sef'ą-lon), n. [NL., < Gr. θάλαμος, an inner chamber, + ἐγκέφαλος, the brain: see thalamus and encephalon.] The parts of the brain about the third ventricle developed from the hinder part of the first primary cerebral vesicle, including the thalami, the optic tracts and chiasma, the infundibulum and cerebral part of the pituitary body, the corpora albicantia, the conarium, the ependymal part of the velum interpositum, a lamina cinerea, and other structures. Also called diencephalon, interbrain, 'tween-brain. See cuts under Elasmobranchii, encephalon, Rana, Petromyzontidæ, and cerebral.

thalami, n. Plural of thalamus.

thalamia, n. Plural of thalamium.

thalamic (thal'ą-mik), a. [< thalamus + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the optic thalamus.—Thalamic commissure of the brain, the middle, soft, or gray commissure; the medicommissure.

Thalamifloræ (thal″ą-mi-flō'rē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1813): see thalamiflorous.] A group of orders of dicotyledonous plants, constituting the first of three divisions called series by Bentham and Hooker. In their system it is distinguished from the others, the Discifloræ and Calycifloræ, by the usual insertion of the petals, stamens, and pistils on the receptacle, not on a disk or on the calyx. The group embraced the 6 cohorts Ranales, Parietales, Polygalinæ, Caryophyllinæ, Guttiferales, and Malvales. In the latest classifications these are more or less separated, and the orders, even when retaining the same names as the cohorts, have a different scope. Most fall within the present orders Chenopodiales, Ranales, Papaverales, Sarraceniales, Malvales, and Hypericales.

thalamifloral (thal″ą-mi-flō'rąl), a. [< thalamiflorous + -al.] In bot., having the petals and stamens arising immediately from the torus or thalamus; characteristic of the Thalamifloræ.

thalamiflorous (thal″ą-mi-flō'rus), a. [< NL. thalamiflorus, < L. thalamus (< Gr. θάλαμος), a bed, + flos (flor-), flower.] In bot., same as thalamifloral.

thalamite (thal'ą-mīt), n. [< Gr. θαλαμίτης (see def.), < θάλαμος, an inner chamber, the lowest part of the hold of a ship: see thalamus.] In Gr. antiq., a rower of the lowest of the three tiers of oarsmen in a trireme. See thranite and zeugite.

> Behind the zygite sat the thalamite, or oarsman of the lowest bank. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 806.

thalamium (thā-lā'mi-um), n.; pl. thalamia (-ą). [NL., < L. thalamus, < Gr. θάλαμος, an inner chamber, a bedroom, a bed: see thalamus.] In bot., a fruit-bearing organ or cavity. (a) A receptacle containing spores in certain algæ. (b) The hymenium of fungi, or one of its forms. (c) The disk of lichens. Lindley.

thalamocœle (thal'ą-mō-sēl), n. [< Gr. θάλαμος, an inner chamber, + κοιλία, a hollow: see cœlia.] The cavity of the thalamencephalon; the thalamic cœlia, commonly known as the third ventricle of the brain.

thalamocrural (thal″ą-mō-krö'rąl), a. [< NL. thalamus, q. v., + crural.] Pertaining to the thalamus and the crus cerebri.

Thalamophora (thal-ą-mof'ō-rą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. θάλαμος, an inner chamber, + -φορος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] A name proposed by Hertwig (1819) for the foraminifers, or those rhizopods which possess a skeleton, or which are invested by a chitinous test or covered by silicious or arenaceous particles: thus equivalent to and conterminous with Foraminifera.

thalamus (thal'ą-mus), n.; pl. thalami (-mī). [NL., also thalamos; < L. thalamus, < Gr. θάλαμος, an inner chamber, a bedroom, a bed.] 1. In Gr. archæol., an inner or private room; a chamber; especially, the women's apartment (Homeric); a sekos.

> The thalamos in Asiatic temples.

> The walls of quarry-stones bonded with clay were similar to walls which were "found by many hundreds in all the five prehistoric cities of Troy, in the treasuries of Mycenæ, in the thalamos of Orchomenos," etc.
> Appleton's Ann. Cyc., 1886, p. 34.

2. In anat.: (a†) The apparent origin of a cranial nerve; the place where a nerve emerges from or leaves the brain. (b) Specifically, the optic thalamus; the thalamus of the optic nerve; the great posterior ganglion of the cerebrum, forming the lateral wall of the cerebral ventricle, and connected with its fellow by the middle commissure of the brain. See cut under cerebral.—3. In bot.: (a) The receptacle or torus. (b) Same as thallus.—Anterior, inferior, internal, and posterior peduncles of the thalamus. See peduncle.—Nucleus externus thalami. See nucleus.—Thalamus nervi optici, or thalamus opticus, the optic thalamus. See def. 2 (b).

Thalarctos (thā-lärk'tos), n. [NL., irreg. for Thalassarctos.] Same as Thalassarctos.

Thalassarachna (thā-las-ą-rak'nä), n. [NL. (Packard, 1871), < Gr. θάλασσα, the sea, + ἀράχνη, spider.] A genus of marine mites belonging to the Hydrachnidæ, a family of watermites. T. verrilli is dredged in 20 fathoms off Eastport, Maine.

Thalassarctos (thal-a-särk'tos), n. [NL. (also Thalarctos (J. E. Gray, 1825) and Thalarctus), < Gr. θάλασσα, the sea, + ἄρκτος, bear.] That genus of Ursidæ which contains the polar bear, T. maritimus. See cut under bear[2].

Thalasseus (thā-las'ē-us), n. [NL. (Boie, 1822), < Gr. θαλασσεύς, a fisherman, < θάλασσα, the sea.] A genus of Sterninæ, or subgenus of Royal Tern (Thalasseus maximus).

Sterna, containing those large terns whose black cap extends into a slight occipital crest, and whose feet are black. See Sterna and tern[1].

Thalassia (thā-las'i-ą), n. [NL. (Banks, 1805), so called from their habitat; < Gr. θαλάσσια, fem. of θαλάσσιος, of the sea, < θάλασσα, the sea.] A genus of plants, of the family Vallisneriaceæ, type of the tribe Thalassieæ. It is characterized by unisexual two-leaved one-flowered slightly tubular spathes, the long-pedicelled male flower with three ovate petaloid segments and six long erect anthers, the female at first nearly sessile and with a long-beaked ovary which matures into a globose roughened fruit dehiscent into many ascending or stellate lobes. The two species are plants growing submerged in tropical seas, with long thong-like leaves from an elongated creeping rootstock; T. testudinum, of the West Indies, known as turtle grass and manatu-grass, is a gregarious rosulate plant of the sea-bottom, with linear leaves about a foot in length.

thalassian (thā-las'i-an), n. [< Gr. θαλάσσιος, of the sea, < θάλασσα, the sea.] Any sea-turtle.

thalassic (thā-las'ik), a. [< Gr. θάλασσα, the sea, + -ic.] 1. In zoöl., living in the high seas; pelagic; marine.—2. Of, pertaining to, or restricted to the smaller bodies of water called seas, as distinguished from oceanic.

> The commercial situation of the trading towns of North Germany, admirable so long as the trade of the world was chiefly potamic or thalassic in character, lost nearly all its value when at the opening of the sixteenth century commerce became oceanic. The Academy, Oct. 26, 1889, p. 265.

Thalassic rocks. See littoral rocks, under littoral.

Thalassicolla (thā-las-i-kol'ą), n. [< Gr. θάλασσα, the sea, + κόλλα, glue.] The typical genus of Thalassicollidæ. T. pelagica is an example.

Thalassicollidæ (thā-las-i-kol'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Thalassicolla + -idæ.] A family of unicapsular or monocyttarian radiolarians of the order Peripylæa, of spherical form, with single nucleus, and the skeleton wanting or represented only by loose silicious spicules. Representative genera are Thalassicolla and Thalassosphæra. Also Thalassicollea.

thalassicollidan (thā-las-i-kol'i-dan), a. and n. [< Thalassicollidæ + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to the Thalassicollidæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Thalassicollidæ.

Thalassidroma (thal-a-sid'rō-mä), n. [NL. (N. A. Vigors, 1825), irreg. < Gr. θάλασσα, the sea, + δρόμος, running.] A genus of small petrels: formerly including those, like the stormy petrel, T. pelagica, now placed in the restricted genus Procellaria.

Thalassieæ (thal-a-sī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1883), < Thalassia + -eæ.] A tribe of plants, typified by the genus Thalassia. See Marinæ.

Thalassina (thal-a-sī'nä), n. [< Gr. θάλασσα, the sea.] The typical genus of Thalassinidæ, containing such forms as T. scorpionoides. See cut under Thalassinidæ.

thalassinian (thal-ą-sin'i-an), a. and n. [< Thalassina + -ian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Thalassinidæ.

II. n. A burrowing crustacean of the family Thalassinidæ.

Thalassinidæ (thal-a-sin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Thalassina + -idæ.] A family of macrurous decapod crustaceans, typified by the genus Thalassina. They have the podobranchiæ completely divided or reduced to epipodites, the pleurobranchiæ not more than four and not posterior, and the branchiæ with foliaceous as well as filamentous processes. They are remarkable for the length of the abdomen and the softness of the test, and are of burrowing habits. They are commonly known as scorpion-lobsters.

Scorpion-lobster (Thalassina scorpionoides).

Thalassiophyta (thā-las-i-of'i-tä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. θαλάσσιος, of or belonging to the sea (< θάλασσα, the sea), + φυτόν, a plant.] A name proposed by Lamouroux for Algæ, but inapplicable from its being too restricted—excluding all fresh-water species.

thalassiophyte (thā-las'i-ō-fīt), n. [See Thalassiophyta.] In bot., a plant of the Thalassiophyta; a seaweed; an alga.

Thalassoaëtus (thā-las-ō-ā'e-tus), n. [NL., orig. Thallasoaëtus (Kaup, 1845), later Thallasaëtus (Kaup, 1845), Thalassaëtus (Kaup, 1847), Thalassiaëtus (Reichenbach, 1850), < Gr. θάλασσα, the sea, + ἀετός, an eagle.] A genus of sea-eagles, in which the tail has fourteen rectrices, as T. pelagicus, of Kamchatka and Alaska. See cut under sea-eagle.

Thalassochelys (thal-a-sok'e-lis), n. [NL. (Fitzinger), < Gr. θάλασσα, the sea, + χέλυς, a tortoise.] A genus of chelonians, of the family Cheloniidæ; the loggerhead turtles.

thalassocracy (thal-a-sok'ra-si), n. Same as thalassocraty.

> We read of Minos, the legendary Cretan ruler, with his thalassocracy, and we think chiefly of war, not of commerce—yet the power of Minos would have been of little moment unless to protect commerce.
> Amer. Jour. Archæol., VI. 440.

thalassocraty (thal-a-sok'ra-ti), n. [< Gr. θαλασσοκρατία, mastery of the sea, < θαλασσοκρατεῖν, rule the sea, < θάλασσα, the sea, + κρατεῖν, rule.] Sovereignty of the seas. [Rare.]

> He [Polycrates] was also the first to lay claim to the sovereignty of the Ægean Sea, or thalassocraty, which at that time there was none to dispute with him.
> Encyc. Brit., XXI. 249.

thalassographer (thal-a-sog'ra-fėr), n. [< thalassograph-y + -er[1].] One who occupies himself with the study of the phenomena of the ocean: same as oceanographer.

thalassographic (thā-las-ō-graf'ik), a. [< thalassograph-y + -ic.] Relating to or concerned with thalassography: same as oceanographic.

The field of work opened to naturalists by thalassographic surveys is of the greatest importance.
A. Agassiz, Three Cruises of the Blake, I. vii.

thalassography (thal-a-sog'ra-fi), n. [Cf. MGr. θαλασσογράφος, describing the sea; < Gr. θάλασσα, the sea, + γράφειν, write.] The science of the ocean; oceanography; that branch of physical geography which has to do with the phenomena of the ocean.

The need of some simple word to express the science which treats of oceanic basins has led to the construction of this term [thalassography].
A. Agassiz, Three Cruises of the Blake, I. i. thalassometer (thal-a-som'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. θάλασσα, the sea, + μέτρον, measure.] A tide-gage.

Thalassophila (thal-a-sof'i-lą), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of thalassophilus*: see thalassophilous.] A suborder or other group of pulmonate gastropods, living on sea-shores or in salt-marshes, as the Siphonariidæ and Amphibolidæ.

thalassophilous (thal-a-sof'i-lus), a. [< NL. thalassophilus*, < Gr. θάλασσα, the sea, + φιλεῖν, love.] Fond of the sea; inhabiting the sea: specifically noting the Thalassophila.

thale-cress (thāl'kres), n. [< thale* (abbr. < Thaliana: see def.), so called from a German physician Thal or Thalius, + cress.] The mouse-ear cress, Stenophragma Thaliana, a low slender herb of the northern old world, naturalized in the United States.

Thaleichthys (thal-ē-ik'this), n. [NL. (Girard, 1859), < Gr. θάλεια, blooming, + ἰχθύς, a fish.] A genus of argentinoid fishes, related to the smelts and caplins. T. pacificus is the candle-fish or eulachon. See cut under candle-fish, 1.

thaler (tä'lėr), n. [< G. thaler, a dollar: see dollar.] A large silver coin current in various German states from the sixteenth century. The thaler of the present German empire is equivalent to three marks, and is worth about 3*s.* English (72 cents).

Obverse.

Reverse.

Thaler of Lüneburg, 1547.—British Museum. (Size of original.)

Thalessa (thā-les'ä), n. [NL.] 1. A subgenus of Purpura. Adams, 1853. —2. A curious genus of ichneumon-flies, of the subfamily Pimplinæ, notable for their size and the great length of the ovipositor. The larvæ live externally upon those of horntails and wood-boring beetles, and the long ovipositor of the adult enables it to bore for a considerable distance through solid wood. T. atrata and T. lunator are common parasites of Tremex columba in the United States. Holmgren, 1859.

Thalia (thą-lī'ą), n. [= F. Thalie, < L. Thalīa, sometimes Thalea, < Gr. Θάλεια, one of the Muses, < θάλεια, luxuriant, blooming, < θάλλειν, be luxuriant or exuberant, bloom.] 1. In Gr. myth., the joyful Muse, to whom is due the bloom of life. She inspired gaiety, was the patroness of the banquet accompanied by song and music, and also favored rural pursuits and pleasures. At a late period she became the Muse of comedy, and to the Romans was little known in any other character. In the later art she is generally represented with a comic mask, a shepherd's crook, and a wreath of ivy. See cut in next column, and cut under *mask*1, 1.

2. The twenty-third planetoid, discovered by Hind in London in 1852.—3†. In zoöl.: (a) A genus of salps, giving name to the Thaliæ or Thaliacea: same as Salpa, 1. (b) A genus of coleopterous insects. Hope, 1838.

Thalia.—From an antique in the British Museum.

Thaliacea (thā-li-ā'sē-ą), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Thaliacea.

II. n. A member of the Thaliacea, as a salp or doliolid.

Thalian (thā-lī'an), a. and n. [< Thalia + -an.] I. a. 1. Of or relating to Thalia, especially considered as the Muse of pastoral and comic poetry; comic.—2. [l. c.] In zoöl., same as thaliacean.

II. n. Same as thaliacean.

Thalictrum (thą-lik'trum), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. thalictrum, thalitruum, < Gr. θάλικτρον, a plant, prob. Thalictrum minus; perhaps so called from the abundant early bright-green foliage, < θάλλειν, be luxuriant: see thallus.] A genus of plants, of the family Ranunculaceæ and tribe Anemoneæ. It is distinguished from the similarly apetalous genus Anemone by its lack of an involucre. It includes about 75 species, mostly natives of the north temperate or frigid regions, with a few in tropical India, the Cape of Good Hope, and the Andes. They are delicate or tall herbs with a perennial base, and ornamental ternately decompound leaves of many leaflets, which are often roundish and three-lobed, suggesting those of the columbine or maiden-hair fern (see cut e under leaf). The flowers are commonly small, polygamous, and panicled, pendulous in T. dioicum and T. minus, and reduced to a raceme in T. alpinum. They consist chiefly of four or five greenish, yellowish, purple, or whitish sepals; the several or many carpels commonly become compressed stalked tailless achenes; the anthers are usually long and exserted or pendent, giving the inflorescence a graceful feathery appearance, and are especially conspicuous in T. aquilegifolium and T. flavum from their yellow color. The species are known in general as meadow-rue; 3 are natives of England, and about 15 of North America. A few dwarf species are used for borders or rock-work, as T. minus and T. alpinum, the latter native of the mountains of Europe and Asia, as also of the Rocky Mountains, and reaching latitude 66° N. About 24 of the taller species are in cultivation, especially T. glaucum of Spain and the Austrian T. aquilegifolium, known as Spanish-tuft and feathered or tufted columbine. T. polygamum, a conspicuous ornament of wet meadows in the United States, reaches the height of four, sometimes seven, feet. T. flavum is known in England as fen-rue or maiden-hair rue, and as false, monk's, or poor-man's rhubarb. T. foliolosum, the yellowroot of the Himalayas, produces tonic and aperient roots used in India in intermittent fevers.

thallic (thal'ik), a. [< thallium + -ic.] In chem., of, pertaining to, or containing thallium: as, thallic oxid.

thalliform (thal'i-fôrm), a. [< NL. thallus, q. v., + L. forma, form.] In bot., having the form of a thallus.

thalline (thal'in), a. [< Gr. θάλλινος, of or pertaining to a green shoot, < θαλλός, a green shoot: see thallus.] In bot., relating to, of the character of, or belonging to a thallus.—Thalline exciple. See exciple.

thallious (thal'i-us), a. [< thallium + -ous.] Same as thallic.

thallite (thal'īt), n. [< Gr. θαλλός, a green shoot (see thallus), + *-ite*2.] Same as epidote.

thallium (thal'i-um), n. [NL., so called in allusion to the green line it gives in the spectrum, which led to its discovery; < Gr. θαλλός, a green shoot: see thallus.] Chemical symbol, Tl; atomic weight, 204.0. A rare metal which was discovered in the residuum left from the distillation of selenium by Crookes, in 1861, and was first supposed to contain tellurium, but afterward proved, by the aid of the spectroscope, to be new. Thallium as prepared artificially has a bluish-white tint and the luster of lead. It is malleable, and so soft that it can be scratched with the finger-nail. Its specific gravity is 11.8. Thallium is somewhat widely distributed, but never occurs in large quantities. The rare mineral called crookesite, found in Sweden, is an alloy of thallium, selenium, and copper, with a little silver. Thallium seems to be present in both iron and copper pyrites from various localities, and it is from the flue-dust from sulphuric-acid works in which pyrites is burned that the metal is chiefly obtained. Thallium is chemically classed with the metals of the lead group, but its reactions are in certain respects very peculiar and exceptional. It has been employed in the manufacture of glass, and is said to furnish a glass of extraordinary brilliancy and high refractive power.

thallium-glass (thal'i-um-glàs), n. Glass in which thallium is used instead of lead, to give density and brilliancy. Compare crystal, 2.

thallodic (tha-lod'ik), a. [< thallus + -ode (-oid) + -ic.] In bot., of or pertaining to the thallus; thalline.

thallogen (thal'ō-jen), n. [< Gr. θαλλός, a young shoot (see thallus), + -γενής, producing: see -gen.] In bot., same as thallophyte.

thallogenous (tha-loj'e-nus), a. [< thallogen + -ous.] In bot., of or belonging to the thallogens.

thalloid (thal'oid), a. [< thallus + -oid.] In bot., resembling or consisting of a thallus.—Thalloid Hepaticæ, Hepaticæ in which the vegetative body does not consist of a leafy axis.

thallome (thal'ōm), n. [< thallus + -ome (-oma).] In bot., a thallus; a plant-body undifferentiated into stem and leaves, as in the Thallophyta.

Thallophyta (tha-lof'i-tą), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), pl. of thallophytum: see thallophyte.] A subkingdom or group of the vegetable kingdom, embracing the Bacteria, Algæ, and Fungi—the lower cryptogams, as they are still frequently called. They are plants in which the vegetative body usually consists of a thallus, which shows no differentiation into stem, leaf, and root, or if there is such differentiation it is but rudimentary. In regard to complexity of structure, they set out from the simplest forms which show no outward distinction of parts, and ascend through numberless transitions to more and more complex forms of cell and tissue, but even in the higher forms they are never differentiated into the sharply separated systems of tissue that characterize the higher plants. They never have either true vessels or woody tissue. In regard to the modes of reproduction, they are in as great variety as are the grades of structural complexity. The term is not used in modern systems. In that of Adolf Engler the plants formerly so called are divided into no less than eleven large coördinate groups.

thallophyte (thal'ō-fīt), n. [< NL. thallophytum, < Gr. θαλλός, a green shoot, + φυτόν, a plant.] A plant without differentiation into stem and leaf; one of the lower cryptogams.

Arboreal plants having structures akin to those of thallophytes. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXII. 792.

thallophytic (thal-ō-fit'ik), a. [< thallophyte + -ic.] In bot., of or pertaining to the Thallophyta or thallophytes.

thallose (thal'ōs), a. [< thallus + -ose.] In bot., same as thalloid.

thallus (thal'us), n. [NL., < L. thallus, < Gr. θαλλός, a young shoot or twig, < θάλλειν, be luxuriant, bloom, sprout.] In bot., a vegetative body or plant-body undifferentiated into root, stem, or leaves; the plant-body characteristic of the Thallophyta. Also thalamus. See cut under applanate.—Filamentous thallus. Same as fruticulose thallus.—Foliaceous or frondose thallus, in lichens, a flat more or less leaf-like thallus which spreads over the surface of the substratum, but is attached at only a few points and can be easily separated therefrom without much injury.—Fruticulose thallus, in lichens, a thallus which is attached to the substratum by a narrow base only, from which it grows upward as a simple or more or less branched shrub-like body.—Stratified thallus. See stratified.

Thalmud†, Thalmudic†, Thalmudical†, Thalmudist†. Obsolete forms of Talmud, Talmudic, etc.

thalweg (täl'veċh), n. [G., < thal, valley, + weg, way.] A line upon a land surface which is a natural watercourse. It is that one of the down-slope lines toward which the neighboring down-slope lines converge from each side; as such, it has the least declivity of all the down-slope lines.

Thammuz† (tham'uz), n. Same as Tammuz, 2. Milton, P. L., i. 446, 452.

thamnium (tham'ni-um), n. [NL., < Gr. θαμνίον, dim. of θάμνος, a bush, shrub, < θαμνός, equiv. to θαμειός, crowded, thick, close-set, < θαμύς*, in pl. θαμέες, thick, close-set; cf. θαμά, often.] In bot., the branched bush-like thallus of fruticulose lichens.

Thamnobia (tham-nō′bi-ạ), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1831), < Gr. θάμνος, a bush, + βίος, life.] A genus of Indian chat-like birds. T. fulicata is 6¾ inches long in the male, glossy blue-black, with chestnut under tail-coverts, and a white wing-patch; it inhabits central and southern India and Ceylon. A second species is T. cambaiensis, of central and northern India. Also called Saxicoloides.

thamnophile (tham′nō-fil), n. [< NL. Thamnophilus, q. v.] A bush-shrike.

Thamnophilinæ (tham″nō-fi-lī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Thamnophilus + -inæ.] 1†. In Swainson's classification, a subfamily of Laniidæ or shrikes, containing the thamnophiles or bush-shrikes. It was a large and heterogeneous assemblage of some oscine with non-oscine birds, mostly species with a stout dentirostral bill, and considered by the old authors to be shrikes.

2. A subfamily of Formicariidæ, contrasted with Formicariinæ and Grallariinæ, containing formicarioid passerine birds with robust hooked bill like a shrike's and moderate or short tarsi, characteristic of the Neotropical region. They spread from Mexico to the Argentine Republic, but are wanting in Chili and Patagonia, and are also absent from the Antilles. The genera are ten, and the species numerous, collectively known as bush-shrikes, and playing the same part in the regions they inhabit as the true shrikes.

thamnophiline (tham-nof′i-lin), a. [< Thamnophilinæ, q. v.] Of or pertaining to the Thamnophilinæ.

Thamnophilus (tham-nof′i-lus), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), < Gr. θάμνος, a bush, shrub, + φίλειν, love.] 1. The most extensive genus of bush-shrikes. With its several sections and synonyms it is considered to cover more than 50 species, exclusive of many others which have from time to time been wrongly placed in it. T. doliatus, upon which the name was originally based, is a characteristic example.

2. A genus of coleopterous insects. Schönherr, 1826.

than (than), adv. and conj. [Early mod. E. also then, in both uses (now used exclusively as an adverb); < ME. than, thon, thanne, thonne, < AS. than, thon, usually thanne, thonne, thænne, then, than, = OS. than = OFries. than, dan = D. dan = MLG. dan, den = OHG. danna, MHG. danne, denne, G. dann, adv., then, denn, conj., for, then, = Goth. than, adv and conj.; with an obscure formative -n, -ne, from the pronominal stem tha in the, that, there, etc.: see the, that.] I. adv. At that time; then. See then. [Old and prov. Eng.]

Forthe than went this gentyll knyght,
With a carefull chere.
Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 49).

II. conj. A particle used after comparatives, and certain words which express comparison or diversity, such as more, better, other, otherwise, rather, else, etc., and introducing the second member of a comparison. Than has the same case (usually the nominative) after it as it has before it, in accordance with the syntactical rule that "conjunctions connect . . . the same cases of nouns and pronouns": as, he is taller than I (am); I am richer than he (is); "thrice fairer than (I) myself (am)" (Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 7); they like you better than (they like) me.

Thenne was ich al so fayn as foul of fair morwenynge,

Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii.

He desires to be answerable no farther than he is guilty.
Swift, Tale of a Tub, Apol.

The late events seem to have no other effect than to harden them in error. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 7.

No sooner the bells leave off than the diligence rattles in.
Browning, Up at a Villa.

A noun-clause introduced by that sometimes follows than: as, I had rather be a sufferer myself than that you should be; and the that is now and then omitted in poetry.

Since I suppose we are made to be no stronger Than faults may shake our frames.
Shak., M. for M., ii. 4. 133.

Sometimes the preceding comparative is left to be inferred from the context; sometimes it is omitted from mere carelessness. A noun or a pronoun after than has a show of analogy with one governed by a preposition, and is sometimes blunderingly put in the objective case even when properly of subjective value: as, none knew better than him. Even Milton says than whom, and this is more usual: for example, than whom there is none better.

thanage (thā′nāj), n. [< thane + -age.] (a) The dignity or rank of a thane; the state of being a thane. (b) The district or territory owned or administered by a thane; also, the tenure by which the thane or baron held it.

thanatography (than-ạ-tog′ra-fi), n. [< Gr. θάνατος, death, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] A narrative of one's death: distinguished from biography, a narrative of one's life. Thackeray, Catharine, vi. [Rare.]

thanatoid (than′ạ-toid), a. [< Gr. θανατοειδής*, contr. θανατώδης, resembling death, < θάνατος, death (θνήσκειν, θανεῖν, √ θαν, die), + εἶδος, form.] 1. Resembling death; apparently dead. Dunglison.—2. Deadly, as a venomous snake.

thanatology (than-ạ-tol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. θάνατος, death, + -λογία, < λέγειν, say: see -ology.] The doctrine of death; a discourse on death.

thanatophidia (than″ạ-tō-fid′i-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. θάνατος, death, + NL. ophidia.] Venomous or poisonous snakes in general, as the cobra, the asp, the adder, etc. The name is scarcely technical in zoölogy, though so employed by Fitzinger ("Systema Reptilium," 1843); it was also used by Fayer for his work treating of such serpents of India. It corresponds in fact, however, to the two suborders Solenoglypha and Proteroglypha, or the crotaliform and cobriform ophidians, and is sometimes written with a capital.

thanatophidian (than″ạ-tō-fid′i-ạn), a. and n. [< thanatophidia + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the thanatophidia.

II. n. Any one of the thanatophidia.

thanatopsis (than-ạ-top′sis), n. [< Gr. θάνατος, death, + ὄψις, a sight, view, < √ ὀπ in ὀψεσθαι, fut. of ὁρᾶν, see: see optic.] A view or contemplation of death. Bryant.

thane (thān), n. [< ME. thane, thein, theign (ML. thainus), < AS. thegen, thegn, a soldier, attendant, servant of the king, a minister, nobleman, = OS. thegan = OHG. degan, an attendant, servant, soldier, disciple, MHG. degen, a soldier, = Icel. thegn, a soldier, warrior, freeman, = Goth. thiggs* (not recorded); perhaps = Gr. τέκνον, child, hence in Teut. boy, attendant, soldier, servant (cf. AS. mago, child, boy, servant, man: see may[2]); with formative -n (-no-), orig. pp., from the root seen in Gr. τίκτειν, τεκεῖν, beget, bring forth, τόκος, birth, Skt. toka, child. Otherwise akin to AS. theów = OHG. diu = Goth. thius (thiwa-, orig. thigwa-): see thew[1]. The proper modern form would be thain*, parallel with rain, main[1], sain, rail, sail, tail, etc.] In early Eng. hist., a member of a rank above that of the ordinary freeman, and differing from that of the athelings, or hereditary ancient nobility. The distinguishing marks of all thanes were liability to military service and the ownership of land. Of the various classes of thanes the chief was that of king's thanes, whose members were subject to no jurisdiction but that of the king. The rank increased in power about the time of Alfred, and about the reign of Athelstan any freeman who owned five hides of land or had made three sea-voyages was eligible to thanehood. The thanehood corresponded nearly to the knighthood after the Norman Conquest. In the reign of Henry II. the title fell into disuse. In Scotland the thanes were a class of non-military tenants of the crown, and the title was in use till the end of the fifteenth century. The notion derived from Boece, and adopted by Shakspere in "Macbeth," that the Scotch thanes were all transformed into earls, has no historical foundation. In some recent historical works the Anglo-Saxon thegn is used in its strict Anglo-Saxon sense.

The fully qualified freeman who has an estate of land may be of various degrees of wealth and dignity, from the ceorl with a single hide to the thegn with five hides.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 37.

With the rise of kingship a new social distinction began to grow up, on the ground, not of hereditary rank in the community, but of service done to the king. The king's thegns were his body-guard, the one force ever ready to carry out his will. They were his nearest and most constant counsellors. As the gathering of petty tribes into larger kingdoms swelled the number of eorls in each realm, and in a corresponding degree diminished their social importance, it raised in equal measure the rank of the king's thegns. A post among them was soon coveted and won by the greatest and noblest.
J. R. Green, Making of Eng., p. 179.

thanedom (thān′dum), n. [< thane + -dom.] 1. The district held or administered by a thane.

Now, from the mountain's misty throne,
Sees, in thanedom once his own,
His ashes undistinguished lie,
His place, his power, his memory die.
Scott, L. of L. M., v. 2.

2. The power, and especially the judicial functions, of a thane: as, the thanedom of Macbeth.

thanehood (thān′hụd), n. [< thane + -hood.] 1. The office, dignity, or character of a thane.—2. The collective body of thanes.

That later nobility of the thegnhood, which, as we have seen, supplanted the ancient nobility of the eorls.
E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 367.

thane-land (thān′land), n. 1. Land held by a thane.

Thane-lands were such lands as were granted by charters of the Saxon kings to their thanes, with all immunities except the threefold necessity of expedition, repair of castles, and mending of bridges. Cowell.

2. The district over which the jurisdiction of a thane extended.

thaneship (thān′ship), n. [< thane + -ship.] Same as thanehood.

Thanet beds. [From Isle of Thanet, in Kent, England.] In geol., a series of beds of pale-yellow and greenish sand, having a thin layer of flints at the bottom, and resting directly on the chalk, thus forming the base of the Tertiary in the London Basin, to which this formation is peculiar. The thickness of the series varies from 20 to 60 feet. The fossils which the Thanet beds contain are marine, and are varied in character; mollusks are especially abundant.

thang†, n. A Middle English form of thong.

thank (thangk), n. [< ME. thank, thonk, < AS. thanc, thonc, thought, grace, favor, content, thanks (= OS. thanc = OFries. thonk, thank = D. dank = MLG. dank, danke = OHG. Rom. of the Rose, l. 4577.

2. Expression of gratitude; utterance of a sense of kindness received; acknowledgment by words or signs of a benefit or favor conferred: now used almost exclusively in the plural.

To some yᵗ are good men God sendeth wealth here also, and they giue hem great thanke for his gift, and he rewardeth them for the thanke to.
Sir T. More, Cumfort against Tribulation (1573), fol. 35.

If ye love them which love you, what thank have ye?
Luke vi. 32.

O, good men, eate that good which he hath giuen you, and giue him thanks. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 257.

[The plural thanks was sometimes used as a singular.

What a thanks I owe
The hourly courtesies your goodness gives me!
Fletcher and Massinger, A Very Woman, iii. 5.]

Thanks, a common elliptical expression or acknowledgment of satisfaction or thankfulness.

Thanks, good Egeus; what 's the news with thee?
Shak., M. N. D., i. 1. 21.

To can or con thank†. See can[1].

thank (thangk), v. [< ME. thanken, thonken, < AS. thancian, thoncian = OS. thancōn = OFries. thonkia = D. danken = MLG. danken = OHG. danchōn, MHG. Gretly y thonk God that gart me a-chape.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 1248.

Heavens thank you for 't! Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 175.

I humbly thanked him for the good Opinion he pleased to conceive of me. Howell, Letters, I. iv. 24.

I thank you, or colloquially abbreviated thank you, a polite formula used in acknowledging a favor, as a gift, service, compliment, or offer, whether the same is accepted or declined. Like other polite formulas, it is often used ironically.

Anne. Will't please your worship to come in, sir?
Slen. No, I thank you, forsooth, heartily.
Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1. 277.

I will thank you, a polite formula introducing a request: as, I will thank you to shut the door; I will thank you for the mustard.—To thank one's self, to have one's self to thank, to be obliged to throw the blame on one's self; be solely responsible: used ironically, and generally in the imperative.

Weigh the danger with the doubtful bliss,
And thank yourself if aught should fall amiss.
Dryden.

II.† intrans. To give thanks.

Which we toke as deuoutly as we coude, and thanke accordyng. Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 39.

thanker (thang'kėr), n. [< thank + -er[1].] One who gives thanks; a giver of thanks.

I hope he may long continue to feel all the value of such a reconciliation. He is a very liberal thanker.
Jane Austen, Emma, li.

thankest†, n. [ME., gen. of thank used adverbially with the poss. pronouns, meaning 'of his, her, their, my, thy, your, our accord': see thank.] A form used only in the phrases his, thy, etc., thankes, of his, thy, etc., accord; voluntarily.

Ful sooth is seyd that love ne lordshipe
Wol noght, his thankes, have no felaweshipe.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 768.

Thyne herte shal so ravysshed be
That nevere thou woldest, thi thankis, lete
Ne removen for to see that swete.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 2463.

thankful (thangk'fûl), a. [< ME. thankful*, < AS. thancfull, < thanc, thank: see thank and -ful.] 1. Impressed with a sense of kindness received, and ready to acknowledge it; grateful.

Be thankful unto him, and bless his name. Ps. c. 4.

As I am a gentleman, I will live to be thankful to thee for't. Shak., T. N., iv. 2. 89.

It is no improper Comparison that a thankful Heart is like a Box of precious Ointment, which keeps the Smell long after the Thing is spent. Howell, Letters, ii. 23.

2. Expressive of thanks; given or done in token of thanks.

Give the gods a thankful sacrifice.
Shak., A. and C., i. 2. 167.

Again and again the old soldier said his thankful prayers, and blessed his benefactor. Thackeray, Philip, xvii.

3†. Deserving thanks; meritorious; acceptable.

Tumaccus thought him selfe happie that he had presented owre men with such thankeful gyftes and was admitted to theyr frendshippe.
Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 141).

Thank may you have for such a thankful part.
Sir P. Sidney (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 550).

thank-offering (thangk'of″ėr-ing), n. An offering made in ancient Jewish rites as an expression of gratitude to God; a peace-offering.

A thousand thank-offerings are due to that Providence which has delivered our nation from these absurd iniquities. Watts.

thanksgive† (thangks-giv'), v. t. [A back-formation, < thanksgiving.] To offer in token of thankfulness.

To thanksgive or blesse a thing in a way to a sacred use he took to be an offering of it to God.
J. Mede, Diatribe, p. 55. (Latham.)

thanksgiver (thangks-giv'ėr), n. [< thanks, pl. of thank, + giver.] One who gives thanks, or acknowledges a benefit, a kindness, or a mercy.

Wherefore we find (our never-to-be-forgotten) example, the devout thanksgiver, David, continually declaring the great price he set upon the divine favours.
Barrow, Works, I. viii.

thanksgiving (thangks-giv'ing), n. [< thanks, pl. of thank, + giving.] 1. The act of rendering thanks or of expressing gratitude for favors, benefits, or mercies; an acknowledgment of benefits received: used in the Old Testament for acknowledgment by the act of offering.

If he offer it for a thanksgiving, then he shall offer with the sacrifice of thanksgiving unleavened cakes.
Lev. vii. 12.

Every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving. 1 Tim. iv. 4.

2. A public celebration of divine goodness; specifically [cap.], in the United States, Thanksgiving day (see the phrase below).

Great as the preparations were for the dinner, everything was so contrived that not a soul in the house should be kept from the morning service of Thanksgiving in the church, and from listening to the Thanksgiving sermon, in which the minister was expected to express his views freely concerning the politics of the country, and the state of things in society generally, in a somewhat more secular vein of thought than was deemed exactly appropriate to the Lord's day. H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 346.

3. A form of words expressive of thanks to God; a grace.

There's not a soldier of us all that, in the thanksgiving before meat, do relish the petition well that prays for peace. Shak., M. for M., i. 2. 15.

General Thanksgiving, in the Book of Common Prayer, a form of thanksgiving, preceding the last two prayers of morning or evening prayer or of the litany, for the general or ordinary blessings of life: so called as distinguished from the forms provided for special persons and occasions.—Thanksgiving day, a day set apart for a public celebration of divine goodness; specifically, in the United States, an annual festival appointed by proclamation, and held usually on the last Thursday of November. It is celebrated with religious services and social festivities. The first celebration was held by the Plymouth Colony in 1621, and the usage soon became general in New England. After the revolution the custom gradually extended to the Middle States, and later to the West, and more slowly to the South. Since 1863 its observance has been annually recommended by the President.—The Great Thanksgiving, in early and Oriental liturgies, a form ascribing praise to God for the creation of the world and his dealings with man, now represented by the preface and part of the canon. See preface, 2.

thanksworthy† (thangks'wėr″ᵺi), a. Same as thankworthy.

> Walpole, Letters, II. 8.

(b) Frequently in opposition to this, in which case it refers to one of two objects already mentioned, and often to the one more distant in place or time: frequently, however, mere contradistinction is implied: as, I will take this book, and you can take that one.

> Of Zion it shall be said, this and that man was born in her. Ps. lxxxvii. 5.

(c) Pointing not so much to persons and things as to their qualities, almost equivalent to such, or of such a nature, and occasionally followed by as or that as a correlative.

> There cannot be
> That vulture in you, to devour so many.
> Shak., Macbeth, iv. 3. 74.

> Whose love was of that dignity
> That it went hand in hand even with the vow.
> Shak., Hamlet, i. 5. 49.

> Majesty never was vested to that degree in the Person of the King as not to be more conspicuous and more august in Parliament, as I have often shown.
> Milton, Ans. to Salmasius.

2. Used absolutely or without a noun as a demonstrative pronoun. (a) To indicate a person or thing already referred to or implied, or specially pointed at or otherwise indicated, and having generally the same force and significance as when used as an adjective: as, give me that; do you see that?

> Foretell new storms to those already spent.
> Shak., Lucrece, l. 1589.

> What springal is that? ha! Shirley, Love Tricks, ii. 1.

> From hence forward be that which thine own brutish silence hath made thee.
> Milton, Church-Government, Pref., ii.

> She has that in her aspect against which it is impossible to offend. Steele, Spectator, No. 118.

(b) In opposition to this, or by way of distinction.

> If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this or that.
> Jas. iv. 15.

> This is not fair; nor profitable that.
> Dryden, tr. of Persius's Satires, iv. 19.

> A hundred and fifty odd projects took possession of his brain by turns—he would do this, and that, and t'other—he would go to Rome—he would go to law—he would buy stock— . . . he would new fore-front his house, and add a new wing to make it even.
> Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iv. 31.

When this and that refer to foregoing words, this, like the Latin hic or the French ceci, refers to the last mentioned, the latter, and that, like the Latin ille or the French cela, to the first mentioned, the former.

> Self-love and reason to one end aspire,
> Pain their aversion, pleasure their desire;
> But greedy that its object would devour,
> This taste the honey and not wound the flower.
> Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 89.

In all the above cases, that, when referring to a plural noun, takes the plural form those: as, that man, those men; give me that, give me those; and so on. (c) To represent a sentence or part of a sentence, or a series of sentences.

> And when Moses heard that, he was content. Lev. x. 20.

[That here stands for the whole of what Aaron had said, or the whole of the preceding verse.]

> I'll know your business, Harry, that I will.
> Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 3. 83.

> Upon my conscience,
> The man is truly honest, and that kills him.
> Fletcher, Valentinian, iv. 3.

> If the Laymen will not come, whose fault is that?
> Selden, Table-Talk, p. 37.

> Certain or uncertain, be that upon the credit of those whom I must follow. Milton, Hist. Eng., i.

> They say he's learn'd as well as discreet, but I'm no judge of that. Steele, Lying Lover, i. 1.

> You are a foolish bribble-brabble woman, that you are.
> Sir R. Howard, The Committee, iii. 1.

> Yet there still prevails, and that too amongst men who plume themselves on their liberality, no small amount of the feeling which Milton combated in his celebrated essay.
> H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 167.

That sometimes in this use precedes the sentence or clause to which it refers.

> That be far from thee, to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked. Gen. xviii. 25.

That here represents the clause in italics. It is used also as the substitute for an adjective: as you allege that the man is innocent; that he is not. Similarly, it is often used to introduce an explanation of something going before: as, "religion consists in living up to those principles—that is, in acting in conformity to them." (d) Emphatically, in phrases expressive of approbation, applause, or encouragement.

> Why, that's my dainty Ariel! Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 95.

> That's my good son! Shak., R. and J., ii. 3. 47.

> Hengo. I have out-brav'd Hunger.
> Car. That's my boy, my sweet boy!
> Fletcher, Bonduca, iv. 2.

(e) As the antecedent of a relative: as, that which was spoken.

> And die, unhallow'd thoughts, before you blot
> With your uncleanness that which is divine.
> Shak., Lucrece, l. 193.

(f) By the omission of the relative, that formerly sometimes acquired the force of what or that which.

> Thogh it happen me rehercen eft
> That ye han in youre fresshe songes sayd.
> Chaucer, Good Women, l. 79.

> We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen. John iii. 11.

> The good of my Countrey is that I seeke.
> Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 179.

(g) With of, to avoid repetition of a preceding noun: as, his opinions and those of the others.

> I would desire my female readers to consider that, as the term of life is short, that of beauty is much shorter.
> Addison, Spectator, No. 89.

(h) With and, to avoid repetition of a preceding statement.

> God shall help her, and that right early. Ps. xlvi. 5.

And all that. See all.—That present. See present[1].—That time†. See time[1].—To put this and that together. See put[1].

B. rel. pron. Used for who or which. That in this use is never used with a preposition preceding it, but may be so used when the preposition is transposed to the end of the clause; thus, the man of whom I spoke, the book from which I read, the spot near which he stood, the pay for which he works; but not the man of that I spoke, etc., though one may say, the man that I spoke of, the book that I read from, the place that he stood near, the pay that he works for, and so on. When the relative clause conveys an additional idea or statement, or is parenthetical, who and which are in modern English rather to be used than that: thus, "James, whom I saw yesterday, told me," but not "James that, etc." That more often introduces a restrictive or definitive clause, but who and which are frequently used in the same way. See who.

> Lord God, that lens ay lastand light,
> This is a ferly fare to feele. York Plays, p. 58.

> Treuli, treuli, Y seye to 3ou, the sone may not of hym silf do ony thing, but that thing that he seeth the fadir doynge. Wyclif, John v. 19.

> This holi child seynt Johun,
> That baptisid oure lord in flom Jordon
> With ful deuout & good deuocioun.
> Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 56.

> And Guthlake, that was King of Denmarke then,
> Provided with a navie mee iorlead.
> Mir. for Mags., I. 184.

> If I have aught
> That may content thee, take it, and begone.
> Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, v. 4.

> He that was your conduct
> From Milan. Shirley, Grateful Servant, i. 2.

> You shall come with me to Tower Hill, and see Mrs. Quilp that is, directly. Dickens, Old Curiosity Shop, vi.

In the following extract that, who, and which are used without any perceptible difference.

> Sometime like apes, that mow and chatter at me
> And after bite me, then like hedgehogs, which > Lie tumbling in my barefoot way and mount > Their pricks at my footfall, sometime am I
> All wound with adders, who with cloven tongues
> Do hiss me into madness. Shak., Tempest, ii. 2. 10.

With the use of that as a relative are to be classed those cases in which it is used as a correlative to so or such.

> Who's so gross,
> That seeth not this palpable device?
> Shak., Rich. III., iii. 6. 11.

> Who so firm that cannot be seduced?
> Shak., J. C., i. 2. 316.

> Such allow'd infirmities that honesty
> Is never free of. Shak., W. T., i. 2. 263.

That as a demonstrative and that as a relative pronoun sometimes occur close together, but this use is now hardly approved.

> That that is determined shall be done. Dan. xi. 36.

> That that is is. Shak., T. N., iv. 2. 17.

> But for the practical part, it is that that makes an angler: it is diligence, and observation, and patience, and an ambition to be the best in the art, that must do it.
> I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 191.

Frequently used in Chaucer for the definite article, before one or other, usually when the two words are put in contrast.

> That on me hette, that othir dede me colde.
> Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 145.

That . . . he† = who; that . . . his (or her)† = whose; that . . . him† = whom; that . . . they† = who; which that† = whom.

> My hertes Ioie, all myn hole plesaunce, > Whiche that y sarue, and schall do faithfully
> With treue Entente.
> Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 40.

> A Knight ther was, and that a worthy man,
> That fro the tyme that he first bigan
> To ryden out, he loved chivalrye.
> Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 44.

> Now fele I wel the goodnesse of this wyf,
> That bothe after her deeth and in her lyf
> Her grete bountee doubleth her renoun.
> Chaucer, Good Women, l. 521.

> This man to you may falsly been accused.
> That as by right him oghte been excused.
> Chaucer, Good Women, l. 351.

[That came in during the twelfth century to supply the place of the indeclinable relative the, and in the fourteenth century it is the ordinary relative. In the sixteenth century, which often supplies its place: in the seventeenth century, who replaces it. About Addison's time, that had again come into fashion, and had almost driven which and who out of use.
Morris, Historical Outlines of Eng. Accidence, p. 132.]

that (ŦHat), conj. [< ME. that, thet, < AS. that = D. dat = OHG. MHG. daz, G. dass = Goth. thata, that; orig. the neut. pron. or adj. that used practically as a def. article qualifying the whole sentence: see that, pron.] 1. Introducing a reason: in that; because.

> Thus I speak, not that I would have it so: but to your shame. Latimer, Sermon of the Plough.

> Not that I loved Cæsar less, but that I loved Rome more.
> Shak., J. C., iii. 2. 23.

> Streams of grief
> That I have wrong'd thee, and as much of joy
> That I repent it, issue from mine eyes.

To practise it above?
Beau. and Fl., Thierry and Theodoret, iv. 2.

What have I done
Dishonestly in my whole life, name it,
That you should put so base a business to me?
Beau. and Fl., King and No King, iii. 3.

I knew him to be so honest a man that I could not reject his proposal. Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iii. 1.

4. Introducing a clause as the subject or object of the principal verb, or as a necessary complement to a statement made.

'Tis a causeless fantasy,
And childish error, that they are afraid.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 898.

You gave consent that, to defeat my brother,
I should take any course.
Fletcher, Spanish Curate, iv. 1.

This is most certain, that the king was ever friendly to the Irish Papists. Milton, Eikonoklastes, xii.

The Naragansett men told us after that thirteen of the Pequods were killed, and forty wounded.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 233.

Shak., C. of E., iii. i. 69.

Where is my father, that you come without him?
Beau. and Fl., Laws of Candy, ii. 1.

6. Formerly often used after a preposition, introducing a noun-clause as the object of the preposition: as, before that he came, after that they had gone, etc., where at present the that is omitted and the preposition has become a conjunction; also, by mistaken analogy with such cases, that was occasionally added after real conjunctions, as when that, where that.

Go, litil bill, and say thoue were with me
This same day at myne vp-Ryssinge,
Where that y be-sought god of merci
Tho to haue my souerein in his kepeing.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 40.

What would you with her if that I be she?
Shak., T. G. of V., iv. 4. 115.

Since that my case is past the help of law.
Shak., Lucrece, l. 1022.

When that mine eye is famish'd for a look.
Shak., Sonnets, xlvii.

7. Sometimes used in place of another conjunction, in repetition. [A Gallicism.]

Albeit Nature doth now and then . . . commit some errors, and that sometimes the things shee formeth haue too much, and sometimes too little, yet deliuereth she nothing broken or disseuered.
Verstegan, Restitution of Decayed Intelligence (ed. 1628), [p. 98.

8. Used elliptically to introduce a sentence or clause expressive of surprise, indignation, or some kindred emotion.

thaumaturgics (thâ-ma-tėr'jiks), n. pl. [Pl. of thaumaturgic (see -ics).] Miraculous or marvelous acts; feats of magic or legerdemain.

thaumaturgism (thâ-ma-tėr'jizm), n. Magic, as a pretended science; thaumaturgy (which is the better word).

thaumaturgist (thâ'ma-tėr-jist), n. [< thaumaturg-y + -ist.] Same as thaumaturge.

Cagliostro, Thaumaturgist, Prophet, and Arch-Quack.
Carlyle, Diamond Necklace, xvi.

thaumaturgus (thâ-ma-tėr'gus), n.; pl. thaumaturgi (-jī). [ML., < Gr. θαυματουργός, wonder-working: see thaumaturge.] A thaumaturge or thaumaturgist: used especially as a title of Gregory Thaumaturgus (bishop of Nescæsarea in Pontus in the third century), from the numerous and wonderful miracles ascribed to him.

Nature, the great Thaumaturgus, has in the Vocal Memnon propounded an enigma of which it is beyond the scope of existing knowledge to supply more than a hypothetically correct solution. Edinburgh Rev., CLXIV. 283.

thaumaturgy (thâ'ma-tėr-ji), n. [= F. thaumaturgie, < Gr. θαυματουργία, a working of wonders, < θαυματουργός, wonder-working: see thaumaturge.] The act of performing something wonderful or marvelous; wonder-working; magic.

But in those despotic countries the Police is so arbitrary! Cagliostro's thaumaturgy must be overhauled by the Empress's physician . . . is found nought.
Carlyle, Cagliostro.

His reporters . . . are men who saw thaumaturgy in all that Jesus did. M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, v.

thave, n. See theave.

thaw (thâ), v. [Also dial. thow; < ME. thawen, thowen, < AS. thāwian = D. dooijen = OHG. towan, douwen, dowen (dōan), MHG. touwen, tōuwen, G. tauen, thaw, digest, = Icel. theyja (cf. thā, a thaw, theyr, a thaw) = Sw. töa = Dan. tö (Goth. not recorded), thaw; root uncertain.] I. intrans. 1. To pass from a frozen to a liquid or semi-fluid state; melt; dissolve: said of ice or snow; also, to be freed from frost; have the contained frost dissolved by heat: said of anything frozen.

Dire hail which on firm land Thaws not. Milton, P. L., ii. 590.

2. To become so warm as to melt ice and snow; rise above a temperature of 32° Fahrenheit: said of the weather, and used impersonally.—3. To be released from any condition, physical or mental, resembling that of freezing; become supple, warm, or genial; be freed from coldness, embarrassment, formality, or reserve; unbend: often with out.

The bog's green harper, thawing from his sleep,
Twangs a hoarse note and tries a shortened leap.
O. W. Holmes, Spring.

Arthur took a long time thawing, . . . was sadly timid.
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, ii. 2.

II. trans. 1. To reduce from a frozen to a liquid state, as ice or snow; also, to free from frost, as some frozen substance: often with out. —2. To render less cold, formal, or stiff; free from embarrassment, shyness, or reserve; make genial: often with out.

Thaw this male nature to some touch of that Which . . . drags me down . . . to mob me up with all
The soft and milky rabble of womankind.
Tennyson, Princess, vi.

With a hopeless endeavor to thaw him out and return good for evil, I ventured to remark that . . . the general had, during the evening, highly entertained us by reading some of his (Mr. P.'s) poetry.
J. Jefferson, Autobiog., xii.

=Syn. 1. Dissolve, Fuse, etc. See melt[1].

thaw (thâ), n. [= Icel. thā (also theyr) = Sw. Dan. tö, a thaw; from the verb.] 1. The melting of ice or snow; also, the melting by heat of any substance congealed by frost.

Still, as ice
More harden'd after thaw.
Milton, P. L., xii. 194.

If the Sun of Righteousness should arise upon him, his frozen heart shall feel a thaw.
Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, ii.

2. Warmth of weather, such as liquefies or melts anything congealed.

She told me . . . that I was duller than a great thaw.
Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1. 252.

The day after our arrival a thaw set in, which cleared away every particle of snow and ice.
B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 24.

3. The state of becoming less cold, formal, or reserved.—Silver thaw, glazed frost; the frozen surface which is occasionally produced at the beginning of a thaw, or when a fall of rain or mist occurs while the air-temperature at the earth's surface is below 32° F.

thaw-drop (thâ'drop), n. A drop of water formed by melting snow or ice.

She gave me one cold parting kiss upon my forehead, like a thaw-drop from the stone porch—it was a very frosty day. Dickens, Bleak House, iii.

thawless (thâ'les), a. [< thaw + -less.] Without a thaw; not thawing: as, a thawless winter.

The winter gives them [flowers] rest under thawless serenity of snow.
Ruskin, in St. James's Gazette, Feb. 9, 1886. (Encyc. Dict.)

thawy (thâ'i), a. [< thaw + -y[1].] Growing liquid; thawing; inclined to thaw.

Of a warm thawy day in February, the snow is suddenly covered with myriads of snow fleas.
The Century, XXV. 679.

the[1] (ŦHē, ŦHę̄, or ŦHē̤), def. art. [< ME. the, < AS. the, rare as an article but common as a relative, f. theó, also rare, neut. thæt, the; the usual forms being se, m., seó, f., thæt, neut., with the base the (tha-) appearing in all the oblique forms (gen. thæs, m., thǣre, f., thæs, neut.; dat. tham, thære, tham; acc. thane or thone, thā, thæt; instr. thȳ or thē, thǣre, thȳ or thē; pl. for all genders, nom. acc. thā, gen. thāra, dat. instr. thām, thǣm); = OS. the = OFries. thi, the, = D. de = MLG. In some cases, as in the tother, the tone, the arises from a merely mechanical misdivision of thet other, thet one, i. e. that other, that one (see tother, tone[2]). It may be noted that initial th (AS. þ or ð) is in the and all the words of this group pronounced ŦH, while in all other cases it is in mod. E. always pronounced th.] 1. A word used before nouns with a specifying or particularizing effect, opposed to the indefinite or generalizing force of a or an: as, the gods are careless of mankind; the sun in heaven; the day is fair; long live the king!

Zuych [such] wyt zet the holy gost ine herte.
Ayenbite of Inwyt (E. E. T. S.), p. 251.

In a somere seyson, whan softe was the sonne.
Piers Plowman (C), i. 1.

Out went the taper as she hurried in.
Keats, Eve of St. Agnes.

2. A word used before a noun to indicate a species or genus: as, the song of the nightingale: used in generalization: as, the man that hath no music in himself.

The mellow plum doth fall, the green sticks fast.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 527.

3. A word used with a title, or as part of a title: as, the Duke of Wellington; the Right Honorable the Earl of Derby; the Lord Brook; the Reverend John Smith. Frequently, with more or less of technical accuracy, the is omitted, especially when the distinctive title is not followed by of: as, Earl Grey, Viscount Palmerston. With the designation Lord, as applied to a peer of any rank, the is generally omitted: the Marquis of Salisbury, for instance, is frequently styled Lord Salisbury. In Scotland and Ireland, the is sometimes placed before family names with somewhat of the force of a title, indicating the head of the clan or family: as, the Macnab; the O'Donoghue.

At last the Duglas and the Persè [Percy] met, Lyk to [two] captayns of myght and of mayne.
The Hunting of the Cheviot (Child's Ballads, VII. 35).

I became acquainted with the Mulligan through a distinguished countryman of his, who, strange to say, did not know the chieftain himself. . . . The greatest offence that can be offered to him is to call him Mr. Mulligan.
Thackeray, Mrs. Perkins's Ball.

4. Indicating the most approved, most desirable, most conspicuous, or most important of its kind: as, Newport is the watering-place of the United States: in this use emphatic, and frequently italicized. The is often placed before a person's (especially a woman's) name, to indicate admiration or notoriety (a colloquial use): as, the Elssler.

Joel Burns was a rich man, as well as the man of the place. R. B. Kimball, Was He Successful? vi.

5. Before adjectives used substantively, denoting: (a) An individual: as, she gazed long on the face of the dead.

The dead
Steer'd by the dumb went upward with the flood.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

(b) A class, or a number of individuals: as, the good die first; do not mix the new with the old.

Now this, . . . though it make the unskilful laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2. 29.

(c) An abstract notion: as, the beautiful.

One step above the sublime makes the ridiculous.
T. Paine, Age of Reason, ii.

6. Denoting that which is well known or famed: as, the prodigal son.

Like the poor cat i' the adage. Shak., Macbeth, i. 7. 45.

Cry, like the daughters of the horseleech, "Give!"
Tennyson, Golden Year.

7. Used distributively to denote any one separately: as, the fare is a dollar the round trip.

So muche money as will byy the same [gunpowder] after xiij[d] the pound.
Sir H. Knevett (1588), quoted in H. Hall's Society in the [Elizabethan Age, App. ii.

The country inn cannot supply anything except brandied sherry at five shillings the bottle.
Mortimer Collins, Thoughts in my Garden, I. 85.

8. Used in place of the possessive pronoun to denote a personal belonging: as, to hang the head and weep.

Is there none of Pygmalion's images . . . to be had now, for putting the hand in the pocket?
Shak., M. for M., iii. 2. 49.

Voltaire is the prince of buffoons: . . . he shakes the sides; he points the finger; he turns up the nose; he shoots out the tongue. Macaulay, Addison.

9. Used to denote a particular day in relation to a given week, or to some other day of the same week. [Obsolete or colloq.]

I mene, if God please, to be at Salisburie the wekes-daie at night before Easterdaie.
Sir J. Popham (1582), quoted in H. Hall's Society in the [Elizabethan Age, App. ii.

Mrs. Proudie had died on the Tuesday, . . . and Mr. Robarts had gone over to Silverbridge on the Thursday.
Trollope, Last Chronicle of Barset, lxviii.

10. Used before a participial infinitive, or gerund, followed by an object: the article is now omitted in this construction.

He alter'd much upon the hearing it.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 5. 12.

11. Used before the relative which: now an archaism.

Clerkes of holikirke that kepen Crystes tresore,
The which is mannes soul to saue.
Piers Plowman (B), x. 474.

[The is generally pronounced as if a syllable (unaccented) of the following word (a proclitic), and its vowel is accordingly obscured, before a consonant, into the neutral vowel-sound of her or but, very lightly sounded (quite like the French "mute e"); before a vowel, often in the same manner, but more usually with the short i sound of pin, only less distinct; when emphatic, as the long e of thee. In poetry, before a word beginning with a vowel-sound, the vowel of the generally may slide into that of the next word, and form with it one metrical syllable; metrically the e is accordingly often cut off in printing. The same so-called elision (synalephe) often took place in Middle English, the being written with the following noun as one word: as, themperour, the emperor.

Th' one sweetly flatters, th' other feareth harm.
Shak., Lucrece, l. 172.

In Middle English manuscripts the was often written, as in Anglo-Saxon, þe, with the character þ; in early print this character was represented by a form nearly like y, and later printers actually used y instead, ye, erroneously printed þ[e] as if contracted, like þ[t] for that, being printed ye or yᵉ, but always pronounced, of course, the. Modern archaists often affect ye for the, and many pronounce it as it looks, "yē."

And on ye Tewsday at nyght we passed by the yle of Pathemos. Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 14.

We afterwards fell into a dispute with a Candiot concerning the procession of yᵉ Holy Ghost.
Evelyn, Diary, June, 1645.]

the[2] (ŦHē, ŦHę̄, or ŦHē̤), adv. [< ME. the, thi, < AS. thē, thȳ = OS. thiu, diu, weakened te, de as an enclitic in des te, des de = D. des te = MLG. deste, duste = MHG. deste, dest, G. desto (cf. AS. thæs the) = Dan. des, desto = Sw. dess, desto = Icel. thvī, thī = Goth. thē, instr. of thata (AS. thæt): see that, the[1].] Used to modify adjectives and adverbs in the comparative degree: (a) Correlatively, having in the first instance a relative force, = by how much, and in the second a demonstrative force, = by so much: as, the sooner the better; the more the merrier.

The mightier man, the mightier is the thing
That makes him honour'd, or begets him hate.
Shak., Lucrece, l. 1004.

And the sooner it 's over the sooner to sleep.
Kingsley, The Fishermen.

(b) Used without correlation, it signifies in any degree; in some degree: as, Are you well? The better for seeing you.

Al for loue of owre lorde, and the bet to loue the peple.
Piers Plowman (B), xi. 169.

Thou shalt not be the worse for me; there 's gold.
Shak., T. N., v. 1. 30.

the[3]†, v. i. See thee[1].

the[4]†, conj. A Middle English form of though.

the[5]†, n. A Middle English form of thigh.

Thea (thē'ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737): see tea[1].] A former genus of plants, now included as a section under Camellia, and comprising the species yielding tea. See cuts under tea[1].

T-head (tē'hed), n. 1. A cross-bar fastened at its middle to a chain, as a watch-chain, trace-chain, etc., for use as a fastening by passing it endwise through a hole, ring, or link and then turning it into a position which prevents its withdrawal.—2. A short bar welded or riveted to the end of another bar at a right angle, as in a form of anchor for masonry.

theandric (thē-an′drik), a. [< Gr. θεανδρικός, being both God and man, < θεός, god, + ἀνήρ (ἀνδρ-), man.] Relating to or existing by the union of the divine and human natures, or by the joint agency of the divine and human natures: as, the theandric operation (the harmonious coöperation of the two natures in Christ).

theanthropic (thē-an-throp′ik), a. [< theanthrop-y + -ic.] Both divine and human; being or pertaining to the God-man.

The written word of God, like Christ, the personal Word, is theanthropic in origin, nature, and aim, and can only be fully understood and appreciated under this twofold character. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 11.

theanthropical (thē-an-throp′i-kal), a. [< theanthropic + -al.] Same as theanthropic.

theanthropism (thē-an′thrō-pizm), n. [< theanthrop-y + -ism.] 1. The union or combination of the divine and human natures; also, belief in such a union or combination. [Rare.]—2. The deification of man, or the humanizing of divinity. [Rare.]

The anthropomorphism, or theanthropism, as I would rather call it, of the Olympian system. Gladstone.

theanthropist (thē-an′thrō-pist), n. [< theanthrop-y + -ist.] One who advocates the doctrine of theanthropism. [Rare.]

theanthropophagy† (thē-an-thrō-pof′a-ji), n. [< Gr. θεάνθρωπος, the god-man (see theanthropy), + φαγεῖν, eat.] See the quotation.

Cardinal Perron . . . says that they [the primitive Christians] deny anthropophagy, but did not deny theanthropophagy—saying, "that they did not eat the flesh, nor drink the blood of a mere man, but of Christ, who was God and man": —which is so strange a device, as I wonder it could drop from the pen of so great a wit.
Jer. Taylor, Real Presence, xii. § 14.

theanthropy (thē-an′thrō-pi), n. [< F. théanthropie, < Gr. θεανθρωπία, < θεάνθρωπος, the god-man, < θεός, god, + ἄνθρωπος, man.] Same as theanthropism, 1.

thearchic (thē-är′kik), a. [< thearch-y + -ic.] Divinely sovereign or supreme.

thearchy (thē′är-ki), n.; pl. thearchies (-kiz). [< Gr. θεαρχία, the supreme deity, prop. rule of God, < θεός, god, + ἀρχειν, rule.] 1. Government by God; also, theocracy.—2. A body of divine rulers; an order or system of deities.

Rank of Athene in the Olympian Thearchy.

★ theater, theatre (thē′a-tėr), n. [Early mod. E. reg. theater, sometimes theatre; < ME. theatre, < OF. theatre, F. théâtre = Sp. It. teatro = Pg. theatro = G. Dan. theater = Sw. teater, < L. theatrum, < Gr. θέατρον, a place for seeing shows, a theater, < θεᾶσθαι, view, behold, < θέα, a view, sight. Cf. amphitheater. The proper modern spelling is theater (as in amphitheater, diameter, etc.); it so appears in Cotgrave (1611), Minsheu (1617, 1625), Sherwood (1632), Bullokar (1641), Cockeram (1642), Blount (1670), Holyoke (1677), Hexham (1678), etc. The spelling theatre appears to have obtained currency in the latter part of the 17th century and since (Coles, 1708, Johnson, 1755; both theater and theatre in Bailey, 1727, etc.), owing to the constant and direct association of the word with the modern F. théâtre (itself a false form in respect to accent).] 1. A building appropriated to the representation of dramatic spectacles; a play-house. Among the Greeks and Romans theaters were among the most important and the largest public edifices, very commonly having accommodation for from 10,000 to 40,000 spectators. The Greek and Roman theaters resembled each other in their general distribution, the Roman theater being developed from the Greek with the modifications, particularly about the orchestra and the stage, due to the difference from the Greek of Roman dramatic ideals. The auditorium, including the orchestra, was commonly in general plan a segment of a circle, usually a half-circle in Roman examples, greater than a half-circle in Greek, and was not, unless very exceptionally, covered by a roof or awning. It was termed cavea by the Romans and κοῖλον by the Greeks. The seats were all concentric with the orchestra, and were intersected by diverging ascents or flights of steps, which divided the auditorium into wedge-shaped compartments (cunei, κερκίδες), and also by one longitudinal passage or more (see diazoma). The stage of the Roman theater formed the chord of the segment, and was called the scena (σκηνή). The Greek theater of the great dramatic period in the fifth century B. C. had no stage, the action taking place in the orchestra, or space below the seats, in which actors and chorus figured together, the orchestra proper being a circle in the center of which stood the thymele, or altar of Dionysus. The Romans appropriated the orchestra for the seats of the senators. The later Greek theaters had stages, at first wholly beyond the circle of the orchestra; but under the Roman domination in Greece the stage of nearly all the Greek theaters was moved forward until at last it occupied the position adopted by the Romans themselves. Besides these essential parts there were the λογεῖον, proscenium, or pulpitum, the stage proper, and the postscenium, or structure behind the stage, in which parts the Greek and Roman theaters differed considerably. Almost all surviving Greek theaters were profoundly modified in Roman times, but the original disposition can still be followed in several, as those of Epidaurus and Sicyon. Scenery, in the modern sense of the word, was little employed, but the stage machinery became elaborate with the advance of time. In the early days of the modern theater the buildings were only partially roofed, and the stage but scantily if at all provided with scenery. The interior of the theaters of the present day is usually constructed on a horseshoe or semicircular plan, with several tiers of galleries round the walls. The stage has a slight downward slope from the back, and is furnished with movable scenes, which give an air of reality to the spectacle which was unsought in the ancient theater. See *box*2, curtain, orchestra, parquet, pit, postscenium, proscenium, scene, stage, *stall*1, thymele.

As for their theaters in halfe circle, they came to be by the great magnificence of the Romain princes and people somptuously built with marble & square stone in forme all round, & were called Ampitheaters, wherof as yet appears one amõg the anciẽt ruines of Rome.

After a well grac'd Actor leaues the Stage,
Are idely bent on him that enters next.
Shak., Rich. II. (fol. 1623), v. 2.

Sceaw-stow. A Theater, a Shew-place, a beholding-place.
Verstegan, Restitution of Decayed Intelligence (ed. 1628), [p. 231.

2. A room, hall, or other place, with a platform at one end, and ranks of seats rising stepwise as the tiers recede from the center, or otherwise so arranged that a body of spectators can have an unobstructed view of the platform. Places of this description are constructed for public lectures, academic exercises, anatomical demonstrations, surgical operations before a class, etc.; as, an operating theater.

Stately theatres,
Bench'd crescent-wise. In each we sat, we heard
The grave Professor. Tennyson, Princess, ii.

3. A place rising by steps or gradations like the seats of a theater.

Shade above shade, a woodie Theatre
Of stateliest view.
Milton, P. L. (1st ed.), iv. 141.

Helps the ambitious hill the heavens to scale,
Or scoops in circling theatres the vale.
Pope, Moral Essays, iv. 60.

4. A place of action or exhibition; a field of operations; the locality or scene where a series of events takes place or may be observed; scene; seat: as, the theater of war.

Men must know that in this theatre of man's life it is reserved only for God and angels to be lookers on.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

This City was for a long time the Theatre of Contention between the Christians and Infidels.
Maundrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 54.

5. The drama; the mass of dramatic literature; also, theatrical representation; the stage: as, a history of the French theater.

But now our British theatre can boast Drolls of all kinds, a vast, unthinking host!
Addison, Prol. to Steele's Tender Husband.

6. An amphitheater; hence, a circular reservoir or receptacle; a basin. [Rare.]

A cascade . . . precipitating into a large theater of water. Evelyn, Diary, May 5, 1645.

Patent theater, in England, a theater, as the Covent Garden and Drury Lane theaters, established by letters patent from the crown. Doran, Annals of the Stage, I. 387.

theater-goer (thē′a-tėr-gō″ėr), n. One who frequents theaters.

theater-going (thē′a-tėr-gō″ing), n. The practice of frequenting theaters.

(Players I meane) Theaterians, pouch-mouth Stage-walkers. Dekker, Satiromastix.

theater-party (thē′a-tėr-pär″ti), n. An entertainment where the invited guests first dine and then go in a party to a theater, or go first to a theater and afterward to supper. [U. S.]

A little dinner at the Café Anglais or at the Bristol Restaurant, with a box to follow at the Français or the Criterion, doubtless is a good kind of a thing enough in its way, but is a mere colorless adumbration of a New York theatre-party.
Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 150.

theater-seat (thē′a-tėr-sēt), n. An ordinary double car-seat having two separate seat-bottoms. Car-Builder's Dict.

Theatin, Theatine (thē′a-tin), a. and n. [< F. Théatin, < NL. Theatinus, < L. Theate (It. Chieti), a place in Naples.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Theatins.

II. n. One of a monastic order of regular clerks founded at Rome in 1524, principally by the archbishop of Chieti in Italy, with the purpose of combating the Reformation. Besides taking the usual monastic vows, the Theatins bound themselves to abstain from the possession of property and from soliciting alms, and to trust wholly to Providence for support, expecting, however, that this support would be derived from the voluntary contributions of the charitable. There were also Theatin nuns. The order flourished to some extent in Spain, Bavaria, and Poland, but its influence is now confined chiefly to Italy. Also Teatin.

theatral† (thē′a-tral), a. [= F. théâtral = Sp. teatral = Pg. theatral = It. teatrale, < L. theatralis, of or pertaining to a theater, < theatrum, a theater: see theater.] Of or pertaining to a theater. Blount, 1670.

theatric (thē-at′rik), a. [< LL. theatricus, < Gr. θεατρικός, < θέατρον, a theater: see theater.] Same as theatrical.

Therefore avaunt all attitude, and stare,
And start theatric, practis'd at the glass!
Cowper, Task, ii. 431.

It is quite clear why the Italians have no word but recitare to express acting, for their stage is no more theatric than their street. Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 260.

theatrical (thē-at′ri-kal), a. and n. [< theatric + -al.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a theater or scenic representations; resembling the manner of dramatic performers: as, theatrical performances; theatrical gestures.

Sheridan's art, from its very beginning, was theatrical, if we may use the word, rather than dramatic.
Mrs. Oliphant, Sheridan, p. 54.

2. Calculated for display; extravagant; showy; pretentious: as, a theatrical flourish.

Dressed in ridiculous and theatrical costumes.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 8.

3. Artificial; affected; assumed.

How far the character in which he [Byron] exhibited himself was genuine, and how far theatrical, it would probably have puzzled himself to say.
Macaulay, Moore's Byron.

Theatrical perspective, the doctrine of the imitation of effects of distance by means of stage scenery; especially, the geometrical theory of such scenery.

II. n. 1. pl. All that pertains to a dramatic performance; also, a dramatic performance itself: applied usually to amateur performances: as, to engage in private theatricals (a dramatic performance in a private house).

In a general light, private theatricals are open to some objection. Jane Austen, Mansfield Park, xiii.

2. A professional actor.

The next morning we learned from the maid that Macbeth's blasted heath was but a few miles from Nairn; all the theatricals went there, she said.
Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 945.

theatricalise, v. t. See theatricalize.

theatricalism (thē-at′ri-kal-izm), n. [< theatrical + -ism.] 1. The theory and methods of scenic representations.—2. Staginess; artificial manner.

★ theatricality (thē-at-ri-kal′i-ti), n. [< theatrical + -ity.] The state or character of being theatrical; theatrical appearance; histrionism.

The very defects of the picture, its exaggeration, its theatricality, were especially calculated to catch the eye of a boy. Kingsley, Alton Locke, vi.

theatricalize (thē-at′ri-kal-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. theatricalized, ppr. theatricalizing. [< theatrical + -ize.] To render theatrical; put in dramatic form; dramatize. Also spelled theatricalise.

I think I shall occasionally theatricalize my dialogues.
Mme. D'Arblay, Diary, I. 63.

theatrically (thē-at′ri-kal-i), adv. In a theatrical manner; in a manner befitting the stage.

Dauntless her look, her gesture proud,
Her voice theatrically loud,
And masculine her stride.
Pope, Imit. of Earl of Dorset, Artemisia.

theatricalness (thē-at′ri-kal-nes), n. Theatricality.

theatromania (thē″a-trō-mā′ni-ą), n. [< Gr. θέατρον, theater, + μανία, madness.] A mania or excessive fondness for theater-going. [Rare.]

Previously, the Church had with praiseworthy impartiality excluded not only actors of all kinds, but also those who were addicted to theatromania, from the benefits of the Christian community. A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., I. 11.

theave (thēv), n. [Also thave; perhaps < W. dafad, a sheep, ewe.] A ewe of the first year. [Prov. Eng.]

thebaia (thē-bā′ią), n. [NL., < L. Thebæ, < Gr. Θῆβαι, Θήβη, Thebes: said to be so named from the extensive use of opium in Egypt.] Same as thebaine.

Thebaic (thē-bā′ik), a. [< L. Thebaicus, pertaining to Thebes, < Thebæ, Thebes: see Theban.] Same as Theban.

thebaine (thē′ba-in), n. [< thebaia + *-ine*².] An alkaloid, $C_{19}H_{21}NO_3$, obtained from opium. It is a white crystalline base having an acrid taste, and analogous to strychnine in its physiological effects. Also called thebaia, paramorphine.

Theban (thē′ban), a. and n. [= F. Thébain, < L. Thebanus, of or pertaining to Thebes, < Thebæ, Thebe, < Gr. Θῆβαι, Θήβη, Thebes.] I. a. 1. Relating to Thebes, an ancient city of Upper Egypt, on the Nile, and a center of Egyptian civilization. —2. Relating to Thebes, in antiquity the chief city of Bœotia in Greece.—Theban year, in anc. chron., the Egyptian year, which consisted of 365 days 6 hours.

II. n. 1. An inhabitant of Thebes in Egypt. —2. An inhabitant of Thebes in Greece.

Thebesian (thē-bē′si-an), a. [< Thebesius (see def.) + -an.] Described by or named from the German anatomist Thebesius (eighteenth century).

In the heart [of the porpoise] the fossa ovalis is distinct, but there is neither Eustachian nor Thebesian valve. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 347.

Thebesian foramina, small openings into the right auricle, and it is said elsewhere in the heart. Many are merely small recesses; others are the mouths of small veins, the venæ minimæ cordis, or Thebesian veins.—Thebesian valve, the coronary valve of the right auricle of the heart.—Thebesian veins, veins bringing blood from the substance of the heart into the right auricle through the Thebesian foramina.

theca (thē′ką), n.; pl. thecæ (-sē). [NL., < L. theca, < Gr. θήκη, a case, box, receptacle, < τιθέναι, put, set, place: see *do*¹. From the L. word, through OF., come E. *tick*³ and *tie*², q. v.] 1. A case; box; sheath. Specifically—(a) In Rom. antiq., a case for the bulla worn by boys around the neck. (b) Eccles., the case or cover used to contain the corporal; the burse. (c) In bot., a case or sac; in a general sense, the same as capsule. Specifically—(1) An anther-cell. (2) The capsule or sporogonium of a moss. (3) The sporangium of a fern. (4) A form of the fructification of lichens. (d) In anat. and zoöl., a sheath; a vaginal structure; a hollow case or containing part or organ, inclosing or covering something as a scabbard does a sword: variously applied. (1) The loose sheath formed within the vertebral canal by the dura mater; the theca of the spinal cord; the theca vertebralis. (2) One of the fibrous sheaths in which the tendons of the muscles of the fingers and toes glide back and forth. (3) The sheath or case of the proboscis of dipterous insects, of disputed homology. It has been variously regarded as a labrum, as a labium, as these two coalesced, and as a modification of the galea. (4) The horny covering of an insect-pupa. (5) In Actinozoa, a corallite or cup-coral, together with the associate soft parts; the cup, formed of calcareous substance, about the base and sides of an actinozoan; the cup, cone, or tube containing a polypite, itself sometimes contained in an epitheca. See endotheca, epitheca, aporose.

2. [cap.] A genus of pteropods, having a sheath-like shell, typical of the family Thecidæ. Sowerby, 1845. Also named Hyolithes (Eichwald, 1840).—Theca folliculi, the external connective-tissue capsule inclosing a Graafian follicle.—Theca vertebralis. See def. 1 (d) (1), above.

Thecaglossa, n. pl. See Thecoglossæ.

thecal (thē′kal), a. [< theca + -al.] Of the nature of, or pertaining to, a theca, in any sense; vaginal; theciform.

thecaphore (thē′ką-fōr), n. [= F. thécaphore, < Gr. θήκη, case, + -φορος, < φέρειν = E. *bear*¹.] In bot.: (a) A surface or receptacle bearing a theca or thecæ. (b) The stipe upon which a simple pistil is sometimes borne, being morphologically the petiole of the carpellary leaf, as in the caper and the goldthread.

thecasporal (thē-ką-spō′ral), a. [< thecaspore + -al.] In bot., of or pertaining to a thecaspore; thecasporous; ascosporous.

thecaspore (thē′ką-spōr), n. [< theca + spore.] In bot., an ascospore; a spore produced in a theca, or closed sac.

thecaspored (thē′ką-spōrd), a. [< thecaspore + *-ed*².] In bot., provided with thecaspores.

thecasporous (thē-ką-spō′rus), a. [< theca + spore + -ous.] Having thecaspores, or spores borne in thecæ; ascosporous.

thecate (thē′kāt), a. [< theca + *-ate*¹.] Having a theca; contained in a theca; sheathed.

Thecidæ (thē′si-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Theca + -idæ.] A family of thecosomatous pteropods, typified by the genus Theca.

Thecidiidæ (thē-si-dī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Thecidi(um) + -idæ.] A family of articulate brachiopods, typified by the genus Thecidium. They have lobed arms, interlocked valves, and the ventral valve attached in adult life. There are 2 living species, in the Mediterranean and the West Indies, and many extinct species, going back to the Carboniferous.

Thecidium (thē-sid′i-um), n. [NL. (Sowerby, 1844), < Gr. θήκη, case: see theca.] A genus of brachiopods, typical of the family Thecidiidæ.

theciferous (thē-sif′e-rus), a. [< NL. theca, theca, + L. ferre (= E. *bear*¹) + -ous.] In bot., bearing thecæ or asci.

theciform (thē′si-fôrm), a. [< NL. theca, theca, + L. forma, form.] Forming or resembling a sheath; thecal in aspect or office. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 137.

thecium (thē′sium), n.; pl. thecia (-sią). [NL., < Gr. θήκη, case: see theca.] In lichens, that part of the apothecium immediately below the epithecium. It consists of paraphyses and asci. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 554.

thedam†, thedom†, thedome†, n. Same as theedom.

thee¹† (thē), v. i. [< ME. theen, then, or without the inf. suffix thee, the, < AS. theón, thión, getheón, be strong, thrive, = OS. thīhan*, found only in the derived factitive thengian, complete, = D. gedijen, thrive, prosper, succeed, = OHG. gidīhan, MHG. gedīhen, G. gedeihen = Goth. gatheihan, increase, thrive; orig., as the old participial form AS. ge-thungen shows, with a nasal suppressed (as usual before h), AS. thinhan;* cf. Lith. tenku, tekti, have enough; Ir. tocad, W. tynged, luck, fortune.] To thrive; prosper.

To traysen her that trewe is unto me,
I pray God let this counseyl never the.
Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 439.

Quod Coueitise "And alle folk were trewe, Manye a man schulde neuere thee."
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 63.

[Especially common in the phrase also or so mote I thee, so may I prosper.

Lasse harm is, so mote I the,
Deceyve hem, than deceyved be.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 4841.

The form theech, from thee ich, is also found in the phrase so theech, so may I thrive; also so theek.

By cause our fyr ne was nat maad of beech,
That is the cause, and other noon, so theech.
Chaucer, Prol. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 376.]

thee² (ᵺē), pron. The objective case of thou.

thee³ (ᵺē), poss. pron. [A dial. var. of thy, or, as among the Friends, a perverted use of the obj. thee.] Thy: as, where's thee manners? [Prov. Eng. and U. S.]

theedom† (thē′dum), n. [< ME. thedom, thedome, thedam; < *thee*² + -dom.] Success; prosperity; luck.

What, yvel thedam on his monkes snowte!

It is considered to be the principle which gives to tea its refreshing and gently stimulating qualities: same as caffein.

their (ᵺhãr), pron. See they[1].

theirs (ᵺhãrz), pron. See they[1].

theism[1] (thē'izm), n. [= F. théisme = Sp. teismo = Pg. theismo = It. teismo = G. theismus, < NL. theismus*, < Gr. θεός, god. The Gr. θεός cannot be brought into connection with L. deus, god, except by assuming some confusion in one case or the other: see deity.] Belief in the existence of a God as the Creator and Ruler of the universe. Theism assumes a living relation of God to his creatures, but does not define it. It differs from deism in that the latter is negative, and involves a denial of revelation, while the former is affirmative, and underlies Christianity. One may be a theist and not be a Christian; but he cannot be a Christian and not be a theist.

Thinking . . . that it would be an easy step . . . from thence [the assault of Christianity] to demolish all religion and theism. Cudworth, Intellectual System, Pref.

Speculative theism is the belief in the existence of God in one form or another; and I call him a theist who believes in any God.
Theodore Parker, Views of Religion, p. 59.

theism[2] (thē'izm), n. [< NL. thea, tea, + -ism.] A morbid affection resulting from the excessive use of tea.

Theism belongs, rather, to that class of diseases in which morphinism, caffeism, and vanillism are found.
Science, VIII. 183.

theist (thē'ist), n. [= F. théiste = Sp. teísta = Pg. theista = It. teista, < NL. theista*, < Gr. θεός, god: see theism[1].] One who believes in the existence of a God; especially, one who believes in a God who sustains a personal relation to his creatures. In the former sense opposed to atheist, in the latter to deist.

Averse as I am to the cause of theism or name of deist, when taken in a sense exclusive of revelation, I consider still that, in strictness, the root of all is theism; and that to be a settled Christian it is necessary to be first of all a good theist. Shaftesbury, The Moralists, i. § 2.

No one is to be called a Theist who does not believe in a Personal God, whatever difficulty there may be in defining the word "Personal."
J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 119.

theistic (thē-is'tik), a. [< theist + -ic.] Pertaining to theism or to a theist; according to the doctrine of theists.

It was partly through political circumstances that a truly theistic idea was developed out of the chaotic and fragmentary ghost theories and nature-worship of the primeval world. J. Fiske, Idea of God, p. 72.

Theistic Church, a church founded in London in 1871 for the purpose of promulgating the views of the Rev. C. Voysey, "which the decision of the Privy Council (1870) has debarred him from preaching as vicar of Healaugh." Its theological basis is a simple theism. Encyc. Dict. — Theistic idealism. Same as Berkeleian idealism (which see, under idealism).

theistical (thē-is'ti-kal), a. [< theistic + -al.] Same as theistic.

That future state which, I suppose, the theistical philosophers did not believe.
Warburton, Divine Legation, iii. § 2.

Thelephora (thē-lef'ō-rä), n. [NL. (Ehrhart, 1787), < Gr. θηλή, a teat, + φέρειν = E. bear[1].] A genus of hymenomycetous fungi, typical of the family Thelephoraceæ. They are coriaceous fungi, having inferior or amphigenous hymenia, clavate basidia, with 4 sterigmata and globose spores. There are about 150 species, among them T. pedicellata, which is somewhat injurious to the pear, eating into the bark.

Thelephoraceæ (thel-ē-fō-rā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Thelephora + -aceæ.] A family of hymenomycetous fungi, typified by the genus Thelephora.

thelephoroid (thē-lef'ō-roid), a. [< Thelephora + -oid.] In bot., resembling, characteristic of, or belonging to the genus Thelephora or the family Thelephoraceæ.

Thelotrema (thel-ō-trē'mä), n. [NL. (Acharius, 1810), < Gr. θηλή, a teat, + τρῆμα, a perforation, depression, alluding to the shape of the apothecia.] A large genus of gymnocarpous lichens, having an urceolate apothecium and a crustaceous uniform thallus. The spores are large, multicellular, and coloriess.

thelotrematous (thel-ō-trem'a-tus), a. [< Thelotrema(t-) + -ous.] In bot., same as thelotremoid.

thelotremoid (thel-ō-trē'moid), a. [< Thelotrema + -oid.] In bot., of the nature of, or belonging to, the genus Thelotrema.

Thelphusa (thel-fū'sä), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1819), prop. Telphusa* or Thelpusa*, < Gr. Τέλφουσα, Θέλπουσα, a city in Arcadia.] A genus of River-crab (Thelphusa depressa).

fresh-water crabs, typical of the family Thelphusidæ, as the common river-crab, T. fluviatilis, of Europe, or T. depressa. See river-crab.

thelphusian (thel-fū'shi-an), a. and n. [< NL. Thelphusa + -ian.] I. a. Relating or pertaining to the genus Thelphusa; belonging to the Thelphusidæ.

II. n. A fluviatile crab of the genus Thelphusa or family Thelphusidæ.

Thelphusidæ (thel-fū'si-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Thelphusa + -idæ.] A family of fluviatile short-tailed ten-footed crustaceans, typified by the genus Thelphusa; the fresh-water crabs.

thelyblast (thel'i-blast), n. [< Gr. θῆλυς, female, + βλαστός, germ.] A female genoblast (which see): opposed to arsenoblast. C. S. Minot, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., XIX. 170.

thelyblastic (thel-i-blas'tik), a. [< thelyblast + -ic.] Having the character of a thelyblast.

thelycum (thel'i-kum), n.; pl. thelyca (-kä). [NL., < Gr. θηλυκός, feminine, < θῆλυς, of female sex, female, < θάειν, suckle.] A peculiar structure on the ventral surface of the pereion in the female of some crustaceans. C. Spence Bate.

Thelygonaceæ (thel-i-gō-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Caruel, 1873), < Thelygonum + -aceæ.] A family of plants consisting of the genus Theligonum. Properly Theligonaceæ.

Thelygonum (thē-lig'ō-num), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < L. thelygonon, < Gr. θηλυγόνον, name of several plants, as Satyrium, so called from reputed medicinal properties, neut. of θηλυγόνος, producing female offspring, < θῆλυς, female, + -γονος, -producing: see -gony.] A spelling sometimes given to Theligonum, a genus of plants, constituting the family Theligonaceæ. It is characterized by numerous straight anthers and an erect ovule. Theligonum Cynocrambe, one of the two species, known as dog's-cabbage, is found throughout the Mediterranean region, where it is used like spinach. It is a procumbent fleshy branching annual, with ovate entire leaves and small axillary flowers, and has somewhat purgative properties.

Thelymitra (thē-lim'i-trä), n. [NL. (Forster, 1776), so called from the hooded or cup-like body formed of wings on the column near the stigma; < Gr. θηλυμίτρης, having a woman's girdle or headband, < θῆλυς, female, + μίτρα, a girdle, headband, turban: see miter.] A genus of orchids, of the tribe Neottieæ and subtribe Diuridæ. It is characterized by flowers with an inferior lip similar to the spreading sepals and petals, an erect rostellum broadly hollowed and stigmatic in front, and stem with a single leaf. There are about 20 species, all Australian except three or four which are natives of New Zealand, one of them, T. Javanica, widely diffused throughout Australasia and Malaysia. They are slender terrestrial herbs from ovoid tubers, having a leaf varying from linear to ovate, and a raceme usually of numerous flowers with shorter bracts. T. longifolia, known as Tasmanian hyacinth, resembles Limodorum tuberosum, the swamp-pink, of the United States.

Thelyphonidæ (thel-i-fon'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Thelyphonus + -idæ.] A family of pulmonate Arachnida, of the order Pedipalpi or Phrynida. They have the segmented abdomen distinct from the cephalothorax and terminating in a very long setiform postabdomen or tail, somewhat like a scorpion's, but slenderer and many-jointed and not ending in a sting; the first pair of legs long, slender, and somewhat palpiform; the pedipalps long and stout and ending in chelate claws; and eight eyes. The general aspect of the Thelyphonidæ is that of scorpions, which they superficially resemble more nearly than they do the other members (Phrynidæ) of their own order. They are known as whip-scorpions. See cut under Pedipalpi.

Thelyphonus (thē-lif'ō-nus), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1806), < Gr. θῆλυς, female, + -φονος, < φένειν*, slay.] The typical genus of Thelyphonidæ, containing such species as T. giganteus. See cut under Pedipalpi.

thelytokous (thē-lit'ō-kus), a. [< Gr. θῆλυς, female, + -τοκος, τίκτειν, τεκεῖν, bear, produce.] Producing females only: noting those parthenogenetic female insects which have no male progeny: opposed to arrhenotokous.

them (ᵺhem), pron. See they[1].

thema (thē'mä), n.; pl. themata (-ma-tä). [NL., < Gr. θέμα, theme: see theme.] 1. A thesis.

His Thema, to be maintained, is that the King could not break with the King of France because he had sold himself to him for Money.
Roger North, Examen, III. vi. § 74. (Davies.)

2. Same as theme, 8.—3. In logic, an object of thought—namely, a term, proposition, or argument. Also theme.

thematic (thē-mat'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. θεματικός, < θέμα, theme: see theme.] I. a. 1. In music, pertaining to themes or subjects of composition, or consisting of such themes and their development: as, thematic treatment or thematic composition in general. Counterpoint is the technical name for thematic composition of the strictest kind; but many passages in works not contrapuntal as a whole are truly thematic.

2. In philol., relating to or belonging to a theme or stem.

Almost all adjectives in German admit of use also as adverbs, in their uninflected or thematic form.
Whitney, German Grammar, § 363.

Thematic catalogue, a catalogue of musical works in which not only the names and numbers are given, but also the opening themes of the works or of their several sections or movements (in musical notation).

II. n. That part of logic which treats of the themata, or objects of thought.

thematical (thē-mat'i-kal), a. [< thematic + -al.] Same as thematic. Athenæum, No. 3262, p. 579.

thematically (thē-mat'i-kal-i), adv. In a thematic manner; with regard to a theme or themes. Athenæum, No. 3248, p. 125.

thematist (thē'ma-tist), n. [< Gr. θέμα(τ-), theme, + -ist. Cf. θεματίζειν, lay down, propose, take for a theme.] A writer of themes.

theme (thēm), n. [Early mod. E. also theam; now altered to suit the L. form; < ME. teme, teeme, < OF. teme, tcsme, theme, F. thème = Pr. tema = Sp. tema = Pg. thema = It. tema = G. thema, < L. thema, < Gr. θέμα, what is laid down, a deposit, a prize, a proposition, the subject of an argument, a primary word or root, a military district, a province, < τιθέναι (√ θε), set, place, dispose: see do[1]. Cf. thesis.] 1. A subject or topic on which a person writes or speaks; anything proposed as a subject of discourse or discussion.

Ac ich wiste neuere freek that . . .
. . . made eny sarmon,
That took this for his teme and told hit with oute glose.
Piers Plowman (C), xvi. 82.

When a soldier was the theme, my name
Was not far off. Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 3. 59.

Fools are my theme, let satire be my song.
Byron, English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, l. 6.

2†. That which is said or thought on a given topic.

Alone, it was the subject of my theme;
In company I often glanced it.
Shak., C. of E., v. 1. 65.

3†. Question; subject; matter.

Why, I will fight with him upon this theme
Until my eyelids will no longer wag.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 1. 289.

4. A short dissertation composed by a student on a given subject; a brief essay; a school composition; a thesis.

Forcing the empty wits of children to compose themes, verses, and orations, which are the acts of ripest judgment. Milton, Education.

The making of themes, as is usual in schools, helps not one jot toward it [speaking well and to the purpose].
Locke, Education, § 171.

5. In philol., the part of a noun or verb to which inflectional endings are added; stem; base.

The variable final letters of a noun are its case-endings; the rest is its theme.
F. A. March, Anglo-Saxon Gram., § 60.

6. In music, same as subject. The term is sometimes extended to a short melody from which a set of variations is developed.—7†. That by which a thing is done; an instrument; a means.

Nor shall Vanessa be the theme
To manage thy abortive scheme.
Swift, Cadenus and Vanessa.

8. A division for the purpose of provincial administration under the Byzantine empire. There were twenty-nine themes, twelve in Europe and seventeen in Asia. Also thema.

The remaining provinces, under the obedience of the emperors, were cast into a new mould; and the jurisdiction of the presidents, the consulars, and the counts was superseded by the institution of the themes or military governments, which prevailed under the successors of Heraclius. Gibbon, Decline and Fall, liii.

9. In logic, same as thema, 3.=Syn. 1. Topic, Point, etc. (see subject), text.

themel†, n. A Middle English form of thimble.

themer† (thē′mėr), n. One who sets or gives out a theme. Tarlton's Jests, p. 28. (F. Hall.)

Themis (thē′mis), n. [< L. Themis, < Gr. Θέμις, law, justice personified, Themis, the goddess of justice and right, < τιθέναι (√ θε), set, place, dispose: see theme.] 1. A Greek goddess, the personification of law, order, and abstract right; hence, law and justice personified.

Such thine, in whom
Our British Themis gloried with just cause, Immortal Hale. Cowper, Task, iii. 257.

2. The twenty-fourth planetoid, discovered by De Gasparis at Naples in 1853.

Themistian (thē-mis′ti-an), n. [< LL. Themistius, founder of the sect, + -ian.] One of a body of Christians also called the Agnoëtæ. See Agnoëtæ, 2.

themselves (ŦHem-selvz′), pron., pl. of himself, herself, itself, and used like these words. [< them + selves, pl. of self.] See himself.

then (ŦHen), adv. and conj. [Early mod. E. also thenne; also than, thanne; < ME. then, thenne, thene, than, thanne, < AS. thænne, thanne, thonne, then, rel. when, after comparatives than; = OS. thanna = OFries. thenne, thanne = D. dan = OHG. MHG. danne, G. dann, also OHG. danna MHG. denne, G. denn = Goth. than, then: see than.] I. adv. 1. At that time: referring to a time specified, either past or future.

Ich for-gat ȝouthe, and ȝorn in-to elde.
Thenne was Fortune my foo for al here fayre by-heste.
Piers Plowman (C), xiii. 14.

Now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known. 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

When thou canst get the ring upon my finger, . . . then call me husband; but in such a "then" I write a "never."
Shak., All's Well, iii. 2. 62.

2. Afterward; next in order; soon afterward or immediately.

First be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. Mat. v. 24.

First the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear. Mark iv. 28.

Their ranks began To break upon the galled shore, and than Retire again. Shak., Lucrece, l. 1440.

3. At another time: as, now and then, at one time and another.

Sometime the flood prevails, and then the wind;
Now one the better, then another best.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 5. 10.

Now shaves with level wing the deep, then soars
Up to the fiery concave towering high.
Milton, P. L., ii. 634.

By then. (a) By that time: as, Return at four, I shall be ready by then.

All will be ended by then.
Swift, To Mrs. Johnson, Feb. 23, 1711–12. (Jodrell.)

(b†) By the time when or that: then in this phrase having the force of a relative.

This evening late, by then the chewing flocks
Had ta'en their supper on the savoury herb, . . .
I sat me down to watch. Milton, Comus, l. 540.

Every now and then. See *every*1.—Now and then. See now.—Till then, until that time.

Till then who knew
The force of those dire arms?
Milton, P. L., i. 93.

II. conj. 1. In that case; in consequence; therefore; for this reason.

So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham. Gal. iii. 9.

If God be true, then is his word true.
J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 245.

He calls the conscience Gods sovrantie; why then doth he contest with God about that supreme title?
Milton, Eikonoklastes, xv.

Can't we touch these bubbles then
But they break? Browning, In a Year.

Then is often used in offering a substitute for a word or statement rejected.

Fal. Good morrow, good wife.
Quick. Not so, an't please your worship.
Fal. Good maid, then. Shak., M. W. of W., ii. 2. 35.

2†. Than. See than.—But then, but on the other hand; but notwithstanding; but in return.

He is then a giant to an ape; but then is an ape a doctor to such a man. Shak., Much Ado, v. 1. 205.

=Syn. 1. Wherefore, Accordingly, etc. See therefore.

then (ŦHen), a. [An ellipsis for then being.] Then being; being at that time.

Our then Ambassador was there.
J. D. (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 643).

It was the letter of the noble lord upon the floor, and of all the king's then ministers. Burke, Amer. Taxation.

Of quite another stamp was the then accountant, John Tipp. Lamb, South-Sea House.

thenadays (ŦHen′a-dāz), adv. In those days; in time past: opposed or correlative to nowadays. [Rare.]

The big, roomy pockets which our mothers wore under their gowns—there were no dresses thenadays.
N. and Q., 7th ser., X. 154.

thenal (thē′nal), a. [< then(ar) + -al.] Same as thenar.

thenar (thē′när), n. and a. [NL., < Gr. θέναρ (= OHG. tenar, MHG. tener, also OHG. tenra, MHG. tenre), the flat of the hand.] I. n. In anat. and zoöl., the palm of the hand or sole of the foot; the ball of the thumb; the vola.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the thenar.—Thenar muscles, those muscles which form the fleshy mass of the ball of the thumb, acting upon the metacarpal and basal phalangeal bone of the thumb, as distinguished from the hypothenar muscles, which similarly act upon the metacarpal bone and first phalanx of the little finger. See hypothenar and thumb.—Thenar prominence or eminence, the ball of the thumb.

thenardite (thē-när′dīt), n. [Named after L. J. de Thénard (1777–1857), a French chemist and peer of France.] Anhydrous sodium sulphate (Na_2SO_4). It occurs in crystalline coatings at the bottom of some lakes at Espartinas (near Madrid), in South America, and in extensive deposits in Arizona. It is used in the preparation of sodium carbonate.

Thenard's blue. Same as cobalt blue (which see, under blue).

thence (ŦHens), adv. [< ME. thens, thense, thennes, thennus, thannes; with adv. gen. -es (see *-ce*1), < thenne, thence: see *thenne*2. Cf. hence, whence.] 1. From that place.

Also a lityll thense ys the place wher ower Savyor Crist taught hys Discipulis to pray.
Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 29.

When ye depart thence, shake off the dust under your feet. Mark vi. 11.

2. From that time; after that.

There shall be no more thence an infant of days.
Isa. lxv. 20.

3. From that source; from or out of this or that; for that reason.

Thence comes it that my name receives a brand,
And almost thence my nature is subdued
To what it works in, like the dyer's hand.
Shak., Sonnets, cxi.

Their parents, guardians, tutors, cannot agree; thence all is dashed, the match is unequal.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 550.

Not to sit idle with so great a gift
Useless, and thence ridiculous, about him.
Milton, S. A., l. 1501.

4. Not there; elsewhere; absent.

They prosper best of all when I am thence.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 5. 18.

From thence, fro thence†, thence: a pleonasm.

Aftre gon Men be Watre . . . to Cypre, and so to Athens, and fro thens to Costantynoble. Mandeville, Travels, p. 55.

All mist from thence Purge and disperse. Milton, P. L., iii. 53.

Those who were mounting were dashed upon the rocks, and from thence tumbled upon the plain.
Irving, Granada, p. 54.

thenceforth (ŦHens′fôrth′), adv. [< ME. thennesforth; < thence + *forth*1.] From that time forward.

If the salt have lost his savour, . . . it is thenceforth good for nothing. Mat. v. 13.

From thenceforth, thenceforth: a pleonasm.

And from thenceforth Pilate sought to release him.
John xix. 12.

Resolving from thenceforth
To leave them to their own polluted ways.
Milton, P. L., xii. 109.

thenceforward (ŦHens′fôr′wärd), adv. [< thence + *forward*1.] From that time or place onward.

Thenceforward oft from out a despot dream
The father panting woke.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

thencefrom (ŦHens′from′), adv. [< thence + from.] From that place. Imp. Dict.

thenne1†, adv. and conj. An old spelling of then.

thenne2†, adv. [< ME. thenne, thanne, thonne, theonne, earlier thanene, thanen, theonene, < AS. thanon, theonen, thonon (= OHG. dannana, dannan, danan, MHG. G. dannen), thence; with formative -nan, -non, < tha*, the pronominal base of that, this, etc., then, than, etc. Hence thence.] From that place; thence.

Lat men shette the dores and go thenne,
Yet wol the fyr as faire lye and brenne
As twenty thousand men myghte it biholde.
Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 285.

thennesforth†, adv. A Middle English form of thenceforth. Chaucer.

thentofore†, adv. [< then + tofore; cf. heretofore.] Before then.

Bishop Atterbury had thentofore written largely.
Disney, quoted in N. and Q., 6th ser., X. 147.

Theobroma (thē-ō-brō′mä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < Gr. θεός, god (see theism), + βρῶμα, food: see broma.] 1. A genus of trees, of the family Sterculiaceæ and tribe Byttnerieæ. It is characterized by flowers with inflexed petals each with a spatulate lamina, and anthers two or three in a place between the staminodes or lobes of an urn-shaped stamen-column. The 20 species are natives of the warmer parts of America. They are trees with large oblong undivided leaves, and small lateral solitary or clustered flowers. For T. Cacao, the principal species, see cacao and chocolate.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.—Oil of theobroma. See oil.

theobromic (thē-ō-brō′mik), a. Derived from Theobroma Cacao: as, theobromic acid.

theobromine (thē-ō-brō′min), n. [< Theobroma + *-ine*2.] A crystalline alkaloid ($C_7H_8N_4O_2$), forming salts with acids, volatile and very bitter. In composition it is nearly related to theïn or caffein. It is found in the seeds of Theobroma Cacao.

theochristic (thē-ō-kris′tik), a. [< Gr. θεόχριστος, anointed by God (< θεός, god, + χριστός, anointed: see Christ), + -ic.] Anointed by God. [Rare.]

theocracy (thē-ok′ra-si), n.; pl. theocracies (-siz). [= F. théocratie = teocracia = Pg. theocracia = It. teocrazia, < NL. theocratia*, < Gr. θεοκρατία, the rule of God, < θεός, god, + -κρατία, < κρατεῖν, rule.] 1. A form of government in which God is recognized as the supreme civil ruler of the state, and his laws are taken as the statute-book of the kingdom.—2. A state so governed: usually applied, with the definite article, to the Jewish commonwealth from the time of its organization under Moses until the inauguration of the monarchy under Saul.

Thus, the Almighty becoming their king, in as real a sense as he was their God, the republic of the Israelites was properly a Theocracy. Warburton, Divine Legation, v. 2.

theocrasy (thē-ok′rā-si), n. [< Gr. θεός, god, + κρᾶσις, a mixing or blending: see crasis.] 1. In anc. philos., the intimate union of the soul with God in contemplation, which was considered attainable by the newer Platonists. Similar ideas are entertained by the philosophers of India, and by many religious sects.—2. A mixture of the worship of different gods.

theocrat (thē′ō-krat), n. [= F. théocrate; < theocrat-ic: cf. democrat, etc.] A member of a theocracy; one who rules in a theocracy.

theocratic (thē-ō-krat′ik), a. [= F. théocratique = Sp. teocrático = Pg. theocratico = It. teocratico, < NL. theocraticus*, < theocratia*, theocracy: see theocracy.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of a theocracy.

And the elder Saints and Sages laid their pious framework right
By a theocratic instinct covered from the people's sight.
Lowell, Anti-Apis.

The Kingdom of God existed at the outset in a national form, in the form of a theocratic state.
G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 7.

theocratical (thē-ō-krat′i-kal), a. [< theocratic + -al.] Same as theocratic. G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 124.

theocratist (thē-ok′ra-tist), n. [< theocrat + -ist.] One who emphasizes the principle of authority, placing revelation above individual reason, and order above freedom and progress, and explains the origin of society as a direct revelation from God. Encyc. Brit., III. 286.

Theocritean (thē-ok-ri-tē′an), a. [< Theocritus, < Gr. Θεόκριτος, Theocritus (see def.), + -e-an.] Pertaining to or in the manner of Theocritus of Sicily (third century B. C.), the founder of the Greek idyllic school of poetry; pastoral; idyllic.

In England the movement in favor of Theocritean simplicity which had been introduced by Spenser in the Shepherd's Calendar was immediately defeated by the success of Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia. Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 346.

theodicæa, theodicea (thē″ō-di-sē′ä), n. [NL.] Same as theodicy. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 820.

theodicean (thē″ō-di-sē′an), a. [< NL. theodicæa (see theodicy) + -an.] Of or pertaining to theodicy.

theodicy (thē-od′i-si), n. [Also theodicee, theodicæa, theodicea; = F. théodicée, < NL. theodicæa (Leibnitz), < Gr. θεός, god, + δίκη, right, justice (> δίκαιος, just).] An exposition of the theory of divine Providence with a view to the vindication of the attributes, particularly of the holiness and justice, of God, in establishing the present order of things, in which evil, moral as well as physical, largely exists. The word in this sense was used by Leibnitz in a series of essays, in which he maintained that metaphysical evil is necessary to moral beings, that physical evil is a means of a greater good, and that moral evil was permitted by God as necessary to the best possible world, as a set-off to moral good, which it increases by contrast.

The second [part of the work] will . . . be speculative, and will contain a new theodicee, and what will perhaps appear to many a new basis of morals.
Coleridge, To Sir George Beaumont (Memorials of [Coleorton, I. 45).

theodolite (thē-od′ō-līt), n. [Formerly theodelite; sometimes theodelet; G. Dan. theodolit; = F. théodolite = Sp. teodolita = It. teodolito (all < E.); < NL. theodolitus*, first in the form theodelitus (L. Digges, "Pantometria," 1571), defined as "a circle divided in 360 grades or degrees, or a semicircle parted in 180 portions"; origin unknown. The word has a Gr. semblance, but no obvious Gr. basis. It has been variously explained: (a) < Gr. θεᾶσθαι, see, + ὁδός, way, + λιτός, smooth, even, plain; (b) < Gr. θεᾶσθαι, see, + δολιχός, long; (c) < Gr. θεῖν, run, + δολιχός, long; (d) < Gr. θεᾶσθαι, see (θέα, a seeing), + δοῦλος, slave; (e) "the O delitus" or "deletus," i. e. the O crossed out, a fanciful name imagined to have been given in view of the circle marked off in degrees by numerous diameters, giving the effect of a circle or "O" erased; with other equally futile conjectures. (f) A recent explanation makes it a corruption of the alidade.] A surveying-instrument for measuring horizontal angles upon a graduated circle. It may also be provided with a vertical circle, and if this is not very much smaller than the horizontal circle, the instrument is called an altazimuth. If it is provided with a delicate striding level and is in every way convenient for astronomical work, it is called a universal instrument. A small altazimuth with a concentric magnetic compass is called a surveyors' transit. A theodolite in which the whole instrument, except the feet and their connections, turns relatively to the latter, and can be clamped in different positions, is called a repeating circle. The instrument shown in the figure follows the system of the United States Coast Survey of attaining simplicity of construction by adaptation to a single purpose — in this case to the measurement of horizontal angles only. This instrument is low and consequently very steady. Within the upright pillar is a truncated cone of steel, and upon this and fitting to it turns Theodolite, constructed by Brunner Brothers of Paris.

the hollow brass pillar carrying the telescope and microscopes. Except for an excessively thin layer of oil, the brass movable part bears directly on the steel, and its weight tends to keep it centered. The pressure is relieved by a small plate of some elasticity fastened to the movable part over the axis and adjustable with screws. It is thus made to turn, as nearly as possible, about a mathematical line. This is the conical bearing of Gambey. The base, which is as low as possible, consists of a round central part, and three arms having screw-feet with binding-screws. A circular guard for the circle (indistinguishable from the latter in the figure) forms a part of the base. The graduated circle is made slightly conical, so that the microscopes may be more convenient. This circle, with its eight radii and interior ring, forms one solid casting, which bears upon the steel axis conically. It is held in place, in imitation of an instrument by Stackpole of New York, by the pressure of a ring above, which can readily be loosened so as to permit the circle to be turned round alone. The telescope is provided with a filar micrometer, with a view of facilitating reiterated pointings — a new principle of much value. The instrument is leveled by means of a striding level. There are four micrometer microscopes (although some geodesists insist upon an odd number), made adjustable so that one division of the circle shall be very nearly covered by two and a half turns of the micrometer-screw. The illumination for these microscopes is made through their objectives by light brought, according to the plan of Messrs. Brunner, by prisms from a point vertically over the axis, where a horizontal ground glass is hung in the daytime and a lamp with a porcelain shade at night, so that the images of the lines plowed by the graver in the polished surface of the circle shall not be displaced by oblique illumination. The clamp is attached to an arm from a ring about the brass upright, and bears upon the circular guard outside the circle proper. The tangent screw is contrived so as to eliminate dead motion. The arm carrying the clamp is balanced by another bearing a small finding microscope. Theodolites are made upon manifold models; but the one figured in preceding column is a good example of a modern first-class instrument.

theodolite-magnetometer (thē-od′ō-līt-mag-ne-tom′e-tėr), n. An instrument employed as a declinometer to measure variations in declination, and as a magnetometer in determinations of force.

theodolitic (thē-od-ō-lit′ik), a. [< theodolite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a theodolite; made by means of a theodolite. Imp. Dict.

Theodosian (thē-ō-dō′shian), a. and n. [< Theodosius, < Gr. Θεοδόσιος, a man's name (lit. 'gift of God,' < θεός, god, + δόσις, gift: see dose), + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to any one named Theodosius, particularly to either of the emperors Theodosius I. (379–395) and Theodosius II. (408–450).—Theodosian code. See code.

II. n. One of a body of Russian dissenters who purify by prayer all articles purchased from unbelievers: so called from their founder, Theodosius, a Russian monk in the sixteenth century.

Theodotian (thē-ō-dō′shian), n. [< Theodotus, < Gr. Θεόδοτος, a man's name (lit. 'given by God,' < θεός, god, + δοτός, verbal adj. of διδόναι, give), + -ian.] One of a party of anti-Trinitarians or Monarchians, followers of Theodotus the Tanner, of Byzantium, about A. D. 200, who taught that Christ was a mere man.

theogonic (thē-ō-gon′ik), a. [< theogon-y + -ic.] Of or relating to theogony.

The theogonic and cosmogonic notions of Homer and Hesiod. Ueberweg, Hist. Philosophy (trans.), I. 24.

theogonism† (thē-og′ō-nizm), n. [< theogon-y + -ism.] Theogony. Imp. Dict.

theogonist (thē-og′ō-nist), n. [< theogon-y + -ist.] One who is versed in theogony. Imp. Dict.

theogony (thē-og′ō-ni), n. [= F. théogonie = Sp. teogonía = Pg. theogonia = It. teogonia, < L. theogonia, < Gr. θεογονία, a generation or genealogy of the gods, < θεός, god, + -γονία, < γόνος, generation: see -gony.] That branch of non-Christian theology which teaches the genealogy or origin of the deities; in a particular sense, one of a class of poems which treat of the generation and descent of the gods: as, the ancient Greek theogony of Hesiod.

He [Epicurus] means the evil Genius and the good Genius in the theogony of the Persians.
Landor, Imag. Conv., Epicurus, Leontion, and Ternissa.

In the hymns of the Rig-Veda we still have the last chapter of the real Theogony of the Aryan races.
Max Müller, Sci. of Lang., 2d ser., p. 429.

★

theol. An abbreviation: (a) of theological; (b) of theology.

theolog, n. See theologue. [Colloq.]

theologal (thē-ol′ō-gal), n. [= F. théologal = Sp. teologal = Pg. theologal, theological, a theologal, = It. teologale, < NL. theologalis*, < L. theologus, theologue: see theologue.] Same as canon theologian (which see, under theologian).

theologaster (thē-ol′ō-gas-tėr), n. [< L. theologus, a theologue, + dim. -aster.] A quack in theology; a shallow or pretended theologian. [Rare.]

This sorely distresses our theologaster: yet, instead of humbling himself under the weight of his own dulness, he turns, as is his way throughout, to insult the Author of The Divine Legation.
Warburton, On Several Occasional Reflections, i., App.

theologate (thē-ol′ō-gāt), n. [< NL. theologatus*, < L. theologus, theologue: see theologue and *-ate*3.] The theological course of a student or novice preparing for the priesthood of the Roman Catholic Church. Worcester.

theologer (thē-ol′ō-jėr), n. [< theolog-y + *-er*1.] A theologian. [Rare.]

Can any sound Theologer think that these great Fathers understood what was Gospel, or what was Excommunication? Milton, Reformation in Eng., i.

The ancient tradition, insisted on by heathen priests and theologers, is but a weak foundation.
Hume, Nat. Hist. of Religion, xi.

theologian (thē-ō-lō′jian), a. and n. [= F. théologien = Pr. theologian; as LL. theologia, theology, + -an.] I. a. Theological. [Rare.]

II. n. 1. A man skilled in theology, especially Christian theology; a divine.

A Theologian, from the school
Of Cambridge on the Charles, was there;
Skilful alike with tongue and pen.
Longfellow, Wayside Inn, Prelude.

The priest made by a sacred caste belongs to the caste that made him; but the great theologian, though sprung out of one Church, belongs to all the Churches, supplies them with truth, learning, literature.
Contemporary Rev., LI. 219.

2. A professor of or writer on theology; any person versed in theology: as, the lawyer was a very respectable theologian.—Canon theologian, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., a lecturer on theology and Holy Scripture who is attached to a cathedral church, or other church having a large body of clergy. Also called theologal and theologus.

theologic (thē-ō-loj′ik), a. [= F. théologique = Sp. teológico = Pg. theologico = It. teologico, < LL. theologicus, < Gr. θεολογικός, of or pertaining to theology, < θεολογία, theology: see theology.] Same as theological.

In those days the great war of theology which has always divided New England was rife, and every man was marked and ruled as to his opinions, and the theologic lines passed even through the conjugal relation, which often, like everything else, had its Calvinistic and its Arminian side. H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 53.

theological (thē-ō-loj′i-kal), a. [< theologic + -al.] 1. Pertaining to theology or divinity: as, theological criticism; a theological seminary.

Solemn themes
Of theological and grave import.
Cowper, Task, v. 662.

2. Based upon the nature and will of God as revealed to man.

It may be wondered, perhaps, that in all this while no mention has been made of the theological principle: meaning that principle which professes to recur for the standard of right and wrong to the will of God.
Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, ii. 18.

The theological virtues [faith, hope, and charity] presuppose a knowledge of the revealed nature of God as a condition of their exercise, while the moral virtues issue in such a knowledge. Blunt, Dict. Theology, p. 797.

Theological ceremonial law. See *law*1.

theologically (thē-ō-loj′i-kal-i), adv. In a theological manner; according to the principles of theology; in respect to theology.

theologics (thē-ō-loj′iks), n. [Pl. of theologic (see -ics).] The essence of theology. [Rare.]

What angels would those be who thus excel
In theologics, could they sew as well!
Young, Love of Fame, v. 374.

theologise, theologiser. See theologize, theologizer.

theologist (thē-ol′ō-jist), n. [< theolog-y + -ist.] Same as theologian. [Rare.]

There be diuers coniectures made by the Theologists, Why men should doubt or make question whether there be a God or no. Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 82.

theologium (thē″ō-lō-jī′um), n. [NL., < Gr. θεολογεῖον (see def.), < θεός, god, + λογεῖον, a place for speaking, < λόγος, word, speech, < λέγειν, speak, say.] A small upper stage or balcony in the scene or stage-structure of the ancient theater, on which the impersonators of divinities sometimes appeared.

theologize (thē-ol′ō-jīz), v.; pret. and pp. theologized, ppr. theologizing. [= Sp. teologizar; as theolog-y + -ize.] I. trans. To render theological.

School-divinity was but Aristotle's philosophy theologized. Glanville, Pre-existence of Souls, iv. (Latham.)

II. intrans. To theorize or speculate upon theological subjects; engage in theological discussion.

The mind of the Church must meditate, reflect, reason, philosophize, and theologize.
Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 49.

Also spelled theologise.

theologizer (thē-ol′ō-jī-zėr), n. [< theologize + *-er*1.] One who theologizes; a theologian. Also spelled theologiser. [Rare.]

theologue (thē′ō-log), n. [Also theolog; < F. théologue = Sp. teólogo = Pg. theologo = It. teologo = G. theolog = Sw. Dan. teolog, < L. theologus, < Gr. θεολόγος, one who speaks of the gods (as Homer, Hesiod, Orpheus) or of the divine nature, in later use, eccles., a theologian, a divine; prop. adj., speaking of God or of the gods, < θεός, god, + λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] 1. A theologian. [Now rare.]

The cardinals of Rome, which are theologues, and friars, and schoolmen, have a phrase of notable contempt and scorn towards civil business. Bacon, Praise (ed. 1887).

2. A theological student. [Colloq.]

The theologues of the Hartford Seminary frequently find striking examples of practical theology in their mission work. Religious Herald, April 15, 1886.

theologus (thē-ol′ō-gus), n.; pl. theologi (-jī). [L.: see theologue.] 1. A theologian.

Theologi who may have expounded sacred legends.
Encyc. Brit., VIII. 468.

2. Same as canon theologian (which see, under ★theologian).

theology (thē-ol′ō-jī), n. [< ME. theologie, < OF. theologie, F. théologie = Pr. teologia = Sp. teología = Pg. theologia = It. teologia = D. G. theologie = Sw. Dan. teologi, < LL. theologia, < Gr. θεολογία, a speaking concerning God, < θεολόγος, speaking of God (see theologue), < θεός, god, + λέγειν, speak.] The science concerned with ascertaining, classifying, and systematizing all attainable truth concerning God and his relation to the universe; the science of religion; religious truth scientifically stated. The ancient Greeks used the word to designate the history of their gods; early Christian writers applied it to the doctrine of the nature of God; Peter Abelard, in the twelfth century, first began to employ it to denote scientific instruction concerning God and the divine life. Theology differs from religion as the science of any subject differs from the subject-matter itself. Religion in the broadest sense is a life of right affections and right conduct toward God; theology is a scientific knowledge of God and of the life which reverence and allegiance toward him require. Theology is divided, in reference to the sources whence the knowledge is derived into natural theology, which treats of God and divine things in so far as their nature is disclosed through human consciousness, through the material creation, and through the moral order discernible in the course of history apart from specific revelation, and revealed theology, which treats of the same subject-matter as made known in the scriptures of the Old and the New Testament. The former is theistic merely; the latter is Christian, and includes the doctrine of salvation by Christ, and of future rewards and punishments. In reference to the ends sought and the methods of treatment, theology is again divided into theoretical theology, which treats of the doctrines and principles of the divine life for the purpose of scientific and philosophical accuracy, and practical theology, which treats of the duties of the divine life for immediate practical ends. Theology is further divided, according to subject-matter and methods, into various branches, of which the principal are given below.

Ac Theologie hath tened me ten score tymes,
The more I muse there-inne the mistier it seemeth.
Piers Plowman (B), x. 180.

Theology, what is it but the science of things divine?
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 8.

Theology, properly and directly, deals with notional apprehension; religion with imaginative.
J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 115.

Ascetical theology. See ascetical.—Biblical theology, that branch of theology which has for its object to set forth the knowledge of God and the divine life as gathered from a large study of the Bible, as opposed to a merely minute study of particular texts on the one hand, and to a mere use of philosophical methods on the other.—Dogmatic theology, that department of theology which has for its object a connected and scientific statement of theology as a complete and harmonious science as authoritatively held and taught by the church.—Exegetical theology. See exegetical.—Federal theology, a system of theology based upon the idea of two covenants between God and man—the covenant of nature, or of works, before the fall, by which eternal life was promised to man on condition of his perfect obedience to the moral law, and the covenant of grace, after the fall, by which salvation and eternal life are promised to man by the free grace of God. Kloppenburg, professor of theology at Franeker in the Netherlands (died 1652), originated the system, and it was perfected (1648) by John Koch (Cocceius), successor of Kloppenburg in the same chair. See Cocceian.—Fundamental theology, that branch of systematic theology which vindicates man's knowledge of God by the investigation of its grounds and sources in general, and of the trustworthiness of the Christian revelation in particular, and which therefore includes both natural theology and the evidences of Christianity.—Genevan theology. See Genevan.—Historical theology, the science of the history and growth of Christian doctrines.—Homiletic theology. Same as homiletics.—Liberal theology. See liberal Christianity, under liberal.—Mercersburg theology, a school of evangelical philosophy and theology which arose about the year 1836, in the theological seminary of the German Reformed Church at Mercersburg in Pennsylvania. It laid emphasis on the incarnation as the center of theology, on development as the law of church life, on the importance of the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper as divinely appointed means of grace, and on Christian education of the youth of the church.—Monumental theology. See monumental.—Moral theology, a phrase nearly equivalent to moral philosophy, denoting that branch of practical theology which treats of ethics, or man's duties to his fellow-men.

The science of Moral Theology, as it was at first called, and as it is still designated by the Roman Catholic divines, was undoubtedly constructed, to the full knowledge of its authors, by taking principles of conduct from the system of the Church, and by using the language and methods of jurisprudence for their expression and expansion.
Maine, Ancient Law, p. 337.

Mystical theology. See mystical.—Natural theology. See def. above.—New England theology, that phase or those phases of Puritan theological thought characteristic of the Congregational and Calvinistic churches of New England.—New theology, a name popularly given to a modern phase of Protestant evangelical theology, especially as found in the New England Congregational churches. As an intellectual movement it has much in common with the Broad Church movement in the Church of England. In its philosophy the new theology partakes of Greek, the old theology of Latin Christian thought.—Pastoral theology. See pastoral.—Polemical theology, the learning and practice involved in the endeavor to defend by scientific and philosophical arguments one system of theology, or to controvert the positions of other and opposing theological systems.—Rational theology. See rational.—Scholastic theology. See scholastic.—Speculative theology, a system of theology which proceeds upon human speculation, as opposed to one which proceeds upon an acceptance of knowledge restricted to what has been revealed in the Bible.—Systematic theology, a general term for all arranged and classified knowledge of God and his relations to the universe, having for its object the vindication of the reality of man's knowledge of God, in opposition to agnostic philosophy, by the investigation of the grounds and sources of such knowledge in general and of the trustworthiness of the Christian revelation in particular, and the ascertaining, formulating, and systematizing of all that is known respecting God and his relations to the universe, in such form as to make manifest its scientific trustworthiness. Systematic theology presupposes exegetical, Biblical, and historical theology, and is the basis of applied or practical theology.

Systematic or Speculative theology . . . comprehends Apologetics, Dogmatics, Symbolics, Polemics, Ethics, and Statistics.
Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 4.

theomachist (thē-om′a-kist), n. [< theomach-y + -ist.] One who fights against God or the gods.

theomachy (thē-om′a-ki), n. [< Gr. θεομαχία, a battle of the gods, < θεός, god, + μάχη, battle, < μάχεσθαι, fight.] 1. A fighting against the gods, as the mythological battle of the giants with the gods.—2. A strife or battle among the gods. Gladstone, Juventus Mundi, vii.—3. Opposition to the divine will.

Lucius Sylla, and infinite other in smaller model, . . . would have all men happy or unhappy as they were their friends or enemies, and would give form to the world according to their own humours, which is the true theomachy.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

theomancy (thē′ō-man-si), n. [< Gr. θεομαντεία, soothsaying by inspiration of a god, < θεός, god, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination drawn from the responses of oracles, or from the predictions of sibyls and others supposed to be inspired immediately by some divinity. Imp. Dict.

theomania (thē-ō-mā′ni-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. θεομανία, madness caused by God, inspiration, < θεός, god, + μανία, madness: see mania.] Insanity in which the patient imagines himself to be the Deity, or fancies that the Deity dwells in him; also, demonomania.

theomaniac (thē-ō-mā′ni-ak), n. [< theomania + -ac.] One who exhibits theomania.

theomantic (thē-ō-man′tik), a. [< theomancy (theomant-) + -ic.] Pertaining to or having the characteristics of theomancy.

White art, a theomantic power,
Magic divine.
Middleton and Rowley, World Tost at Tennis.

theomorphic (thē-ō-môr′fik), a. [< Gr. θεόμορφος, having the form of a god, < θεός, god, + μορφή, form.] Having the form, image, or likeness of God. B'unt, Dict. Theology, p. 324.

theomorphism (thē-ō-môr′fizm), n. Theomorphic character. Fortnightly Rev., V. xxxix. 63.

theo-mythology (thē″ō-mi-thol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. θεός, god, + μυθολογία, mythology.] See the quotation.

Thus it has been with that which, following German example, I have denominated the Theo-mythology of Homer. By that term it seems not improper to designate a mixture of theology and mythology, as these two words are commonly understood. Theology I suppose to mean a system dealing with the knowledge of God and the unseen world; mythology, a system conversant with the inventions of man concerning them.
Gladstone, Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age, II. 2.

Theopaschite (thē-ō-pas′kīt), n. [< LGr. Θεοπασχῖται, < Gr. θεός, god, + πάσχειν, suffer, + -ite[2].] In theol., one who holds that God suffered and was crucified in Christ's passion. Philologically the word may be made to include the Patripassians, who identified God the Father with God the Son, and therefore held that God the Father was crucified. It is in actual use, however, restricted to designate the Monophysites. Also Theopassian.

The liturgical shibboleth of the Monophysites was "God crucified," which they introduced into the Trisagion: hence they are also called Theopaschites.
Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 62.

theopaschitism (thē-ō-pas′kī-tizm), n. [< Theopaschite + -ism.] The doctrine peculiar to the Theopaschites.

theopathetic (thē″ō-pā-thet′ik), a. [< theopath-y, after pathetic.] Of or pertaining to theopathy. See the second quotation under theosophist.

theopathic (thē-ō-path′ik), a. [< theopath-y + -ic.] Same as theopathetic.

theopathy (thē-op′a-thi), n. [< Gr. θεός, god, + -πάθεια, < πάθος, suffering: see pathos.] Emotion excited by the contemplation of God; piety, or a sense of piety. [Rare.]

The pleasures and pains of theopathy, . . . all those pleasures and pains which the contemplation of God and his attributes, and of our relation to him, raises up in the minds of different persons, or in that of the same person at different times.
Hartley, On Man, I. iv. 5.

theophanic (thē-ō-fan′ik), a. [< theophan-y + -ic.] Relating to a theophany; pertaining to an actual appearance of a god to man.

The notion of angels as divine armies is not like that of the individual "messenger" closely connected with the theophanic history.
W. R. Smith, Encyc. Brit., II. 27.

theophany (thē-of′a-ni), n. [= OF. theophanie, theophaine, thiphanie, thiphaine, F. théophanie = OIt. theofania, teofania = G. theophanie, < ML. theophania, theofania, < Gr. θεοφάνεια, θεοφάνια, < θεός, god, + φαίνεσθαι, appear.] 1. A manifestation of God or of gods to man by actual appearance. The term is applied specifically to the appearance of God to the patriarchs in angelic or human form, and to Christ's nativity, baptism, and second coming.

The Creator alone truly is; the universe is but a sublime theophany, a visible manifestation of God.
Milman, Latin Christianity, viii. 5.

The surest means of obtaining a knowledge of the [Homeric] gods, and of their will, was through their direct personal manifestation, in visible theophanies.
G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 84.

2. [cap.] The festival of the Epiphany.

theophilanthropic (thē-ō-fil-an-throp′ik), a. [< theophilanthrop-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to theophilanthropism or the theophilanthropists; uniting love to God with love to man.

The theophilanthropic ideas of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge.
Contemporary Rev., XLIX. 341.

theophilanthropism (thē″ō-fi-lan′thrō-pizm), n. [< theophilanthrop-y + -ism.] Love to both God and man; the doctrines or tenets of the theophilanthropists. Also theophilanthropy.

theophilanthropist (thē″ō-fi-lan′thrō-pist), n. [< theophilanthrop-y + -ist.] 1. One who practises or professes theophilanthropism.—2. One of a society formed at Paris in the period of the Directory, having for its object the establishment of a new religion in place of Christianity, which had been abolished by the Convention. The system of belief thus attempted to be established was pure deism.

theophilanthropy (thē″ō-fi-lan′thrō-pi), n. [< Gr. θεός, god, + φιλανθρωπία, love to man: see philanthropy.] Same as theophilanthropism.
T. Paine.

theophile (thē′ō-fil), n. [< Gr. θεός, god, + φιλειν, love. Cf. Gr. θεόφιλος, dear to the gods.] One who loves God. [Rare.]

Afflictions are the Proportion [portion] of the best Theophiles.
Howell, Letters, ii. 41.

theophilosophic (thē-ō-fil-ō-sof′ik), a. [< Gr. θεός, god, + φιλοσοφία, philosophy, + -ic.] Combining, or pertaining to the combination of, theism and philosophy.

Theophrasta (thē-ō-fras′tạ), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < L. Theophrastus, < Gr. Θεόφραστος, Theophrastus, a Greek philosopher (about 373–288 B. C.).] A genus of plants, type of the family Theophrastaceæ. It is characterized by a cylindrical corolla bearing on its base five extrorse anthers and as many scale-shaped staminodes. There are 2 species, all natives of Hayti. They are smooth shrubs, with a robust erect trunk, and spreading spiny-toothed leaves crowded toward the top. The large white flowers are compactly clustered in short racemes. Many species once included in this genus are now separated under the name Clavija (Ruiz and Pavon, 1794). T. Jussiæi is cultivated under glass for its handsome leaves; in Hayti, where it is known as le petit coco, a bread is prepared from its pounded seeds.

Theophrastaceæ (thē-ō-fras-tā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (H. G. L. Reichenbach, 1828), < Theophrasta + -aceæ.] A family of plants, of the order Primulales, characterized by the presence of staminodes on the base of the corolla. It includes 4 genera of shrubs or small trees, principally natives of tropical America, of which Theophrasta (the type), Clavija, and Jaquinia are the chief, one species of the last-named occurring within the United States.

theopneustic (thē-op-nūs′tik), a. [< theopneust-y + -ic.] Given by inspiration of the Spirit of God. Imp. Dict.

theopneusty (thē′op-nūs-ti), n. [= F. théopneustie, < Gr. θεόπνευστος, inspired of God, < Gr. θεός, god, + πνευστός, inspired, < πνεῖν, breathe, blow.] Divine inspiration; the supernatural influence of the Divine Spirit in qualifying men to receive and communicate revealed truth.

theorbist† (thē-ôr′bist), n. [< theorbo + -ist.] A performer on the theorbo.

theorbo (thē-ôr′bō), n. [= F. théorbe, téorbe = Sp. tiorba, < It. tiorba, a musical instrument: origin unknown.] A musical instrument of the lute class, having two necks, the one above the other, the lower bearing the melody strings, which were stretched over a fretted fingerboard, and the upper bearing the accompaniment strings or "diapasons," which were deeper in pitch, and were played without being stopped. The number and tuning of the strings varied considerably, as did the size and shape of the instrument as a whole. The theorbo was much used in the seventeenth century for accompaniments of all kinds, and was an important constituent of the orchestra of the period. Many lutes were made over into theorbos by the addition of a second neck. The essential differences between the theorbo, the archlute, and the chitarrone appear to be small, though their general shape varied considerably; and the names were used more or less interchangeably. Also called cithara bijuga, or double-necked lute.

Some, that delight to touch the sterner wiry Chord,
The Cythron, the Pandore, and the theorbo strike.
Drayton, Polyolbion, iv. 361.

★ theorem (thē′ō-rem), n. [= F. théorème = Sp. teorema = Pg. theorema = It. teorema = G. theorem, < L. theorema = Gr. θεώρημα, a sight, spectacle, a principle contemplated, a rule, theorem, < θεωρεῖν, look at, view, contemplate, < θεωρός, a spectator, < θεᾶσθαι, see, view. Cf. theory.] 1. A universal demonstrable proposition. In the strict sense, a theorem must be true; it cannot be self-evident; it must be capable of being rendered evident by necessary reasoning and not by induction merely; and it must be a universal, not a particular proposition. But a proposition the proof of which is excessively easy or involves no genuine diagrammatic reasoning is not usually called a theorem.

The schoolmen had framed a number of subtile and intricate axioms and theorems, to save the practice of the Church. Bacon, Superstition (ed. 1887).

By my theorems,
Which your polite and terser gallants practise,
I re-refine the court, and civilize
Their barbarous natures.
Massinger, Emperor of the East, i. 2.

2. In geom., a demonstrable theoretical proposition. There is a traditional distinction between a problem and a theorem, to the effect that a problem is practical, while a theorem is theoretical. Pappus, who makes this distinction, admits that it is not generally observed by the Greek geometers, and it has not been in general use except by editors and students of Euclid. It is recommended, however, by the circumstance that a theorem in the general and best sense is a universal proposition, and as such substantially a statement that something is impossible, while the kind of proposition called in geometry a problem is a statement that something is possible; the former demands demonstration only, while the latter requires solution, or the discovery of both method and demonstration.

I hope that it may not be considered as unpardonable vanity or presumption on my part if, as my own taste has always led me to feel a greater interest in methods than in results, so it is by methods, rather than by any theorems which can be separately quoted, that I desire and hope to be remembered. Sir W. R. Hamilton.

Abel's theorem, the proposition that if we have several functions whose derivatives can be roots of the same algebraic equation having all its coefficients rational functions of one variable, we can always express the sum of any number of such functions as the sum of an algebraic and a logarithmic function, provided we establish between the variables of the functions in question a certain number of algebraic relations: named after Niels Henrik Abel (1802–29), who first published it in 1826.—Addition theorem, a formula for a function of a sum of variables, such as

$$\sin(a+b) = \sin a \cos b + \cos a \sin b.$$

Arbogast's theorem, a rule for the expansion of functions of functions, given in 1800 by L. F. A. Arbogast (1759–1803).—Aronhold's theorem, one of a number of propositions constituting the foundations of the theory of ternary cubics, given in 1849 by S. H. Aronhold (born 1819: died 1884).—Bayes's theorem, the proposition that the probability of a cause is equal to the probability that an observed event would follow from it divided by the sum of the corresponding probabilities for all possible causes. This fallacious rule was given by Rev. Thomas Bayes in 1763.—Becker's theorem, the proposition that in all moving systems there is a tendency to motions of shorter period, and that if there is a sufficient difference in the periods compared this tendency is a maximum: given by G. F. Becker in 1886.—Beltrami's theorem, the proposition that the center of a circle circumscribed about a triangle is the center of gravity of the centers of the inscribed and escribed circles.—Berger's theorem, one of a number of theorems relating to the limiting values of means of whole numbers, given by A. Berger in 1880. One of these theorems is that for $n = \infty$ the average sum of the divisors of n is $\frac{1}{6}\pi^2 n$.—Bernoulli's theorem. (a) The doctrine that the relative frequency of an event in a number of random trials tends as that number is increased toward the probability of it, or its relative frequency in all experience. This fundamental principle, which is not properly a theorem, was given by Jacob Bernoulli (1654–1705). (b) The proposition that the velocity of a liquid flowing from a reservoir is equal to what it would have if it were to fall freely from the level in the reservoir; or, more generally, if p is the pressure, ρ the density, V the potential of the forces, q the resultant velocity, A a certain quantity constant along a streamline, then

$$\int \frac{dp}{\rho} + V + \tfrac{1}{2}q^2 = A:$$ given by Daniel Bernoulli (1700–82) in 1738.—Bertrand's theorem, the proposition that when a dynamical system receives a sudden impulse the energy actually acquired exceeds the energy by any other motion consistent with the conditions of the system and obeying the law of energy, by an amount equal to the energy of the motion which must be compounded with the supposed motion to produce the actual motion: an extension of a known proposition, given by J. L. F. Bertrand (born 1822).—Betti's theorem, the proposition that the loci of the points of a surface for which the sum on the one hand and the difference on the other of the geodetic distances of two fixed curves on the surface are constant form an orthogonal system: given by E. Betti in 1858, and by J. Weingarten in more general form in 1863.—Bézout's theorem, the proposition that the degree of the equation resulting from the elimination of a variable between two equations is equal to the product of the degrees of these equations, which was shown by E. Bézout (1730–83) in 1779.—Binet's theorem. (a) The proposition that the principal axes for any point of a rigid body are normals to three quadric surfaces through that point confocal with the central ellipsoid: given by J. P. M. Binet (1786–1856) in 1811. (b) The generalized multiplication theorem of determinants (1812).—Binomial theorem. See binomial.—Bitonti's theorem, one of certain metrical theorems regarding the intersections of conics demonstrated by V. N. Bitonti in 1870.—Boltzmann's theorem, the proposition, proved by L. Boltzmann in 1868, that the mean living force of all the particles of a mixed gas will come to be the same.—Boole's theorem, the expansion

given by the eminent English mathematician George Boole (1815–64).—Bour's theorem, the proposition that helicoids are deformable into surfaces of revolution: given in 1862 by the French mathematician J. E. E. Bour (1832–1866).—Brianchon's theorem, the proposition that the lines joining opposite vertices of a hexagon circumscribed about a conic meet in one point: given by C. J. Brianchon (born 1783: died 1864) in 1806. It was the earliest application of polar reciprocals.—Budan's theorem, the proposition that if the roots of an algebraic equation are diminished first by one number and then by another, there cannot be more real roots whose values lie between those numbers than the number of changes of sign of the coefficients in passing from one to the other: given and demonstrated in 1811 by the French mathematician Budan.—Bürmann's theorem, a formula for developing one function in terms of another, by an application of Lagrange's theorem.—Cagnoli's theorem, in spherical trigon., the formula for the sine of half the spherical excess in terms of the sides: given by the Italian astronomer Andrea Cagnoli (1743–1816).—Cantor's theorem, the proposition that if for every value of x greater than a and less than b the formula holds that limit $(A_n \sin nx + B_n \cos nx) = 0$, then also limit $A_n = 0$ and limit $B_n = 0$: given by G. Cantor in 1870.—Carnot's theorem. (a) The proposition that if the sides of a triangle ABC (produced if necessary) cut a conic, AB in C′ and C″, AC in B′ and B″, BC in A′ and A″, then $AB' \times AB'' \times BC' \times BC'' \times CA' \times CA'' = CB' \times CB'' \times BA' \times BA'' \times AC' \times AC''$. (b) The proposition that in the impact of inelastic bodies vis viva is always lost. (c) The proposition that in explosions vis viva is always gained. These theorems are all due to the eminent mathematician General L. N. M. Carnot (1753–1823), who published (a) in 1803 and (b) and (c) in 1786. (d) The proposition that the ratio of the maximum mechanical effect to the whole heat expended in an expansive engine is a function solely of the two temperatures at which the heat is received and emitted: given in 1824 by Sadi Carnot (1796–1832): often called Carnot's principle.—Casey's theorem, the proposition that if $S_1 = 0, S_2 = 0, S_3 = 0$ are the equations of three circles, and if l_1, l_2, l_3 are respectively the lengths of the common tangents from contact to contact of the last two, the first and last, and the first two, then the equation of a circle which touches all three circles is given by John Casey in 1866.—Catalan's theorem, the proposition that the only real minimal ruled surface is the square-threaded screw-surface $x = a \arctan(y/z)$: named after E. C. Catalan (1814–1894).—Cauchy's theorem. (a) The proposition that if a variable describes a closed contour in the plane of complex quantity, the argument of any synectic function will in the process go through its whole cycle of values as many times as it has zeros or roots within that contour. (b) The proposition that if the order of a group is divisible by a prime number, then it contains a group of the order of that prime. The extension of this—that if the order of a group is divisible by a power of a prime, it contains a group whose order is that power—is called Cauchy and Sylow's theorem, or simply Sylow's theorem, because proved by the Norwegian L. Sylow in 1872. (c) The rule for the development of determinants according to binary products of a row and a column. (d) The false proposition that the sum of a convergent series whose terms are all continuous functions of a variable is itself continuous. (e) Certain other theorems are often referred to as Cauchy's, with or without further specification. All these propositions are due to the extraordinary French analyst, Baron A. L. Cauchy (1789–1857).—Cavendish's theorem, the proposition that if a uniform spherical shell exerts no attraction on an interior particle, the law of attraction is that of the inverse square of the distance: given by Henry Cavendish (1731–1810).—Cayley's theorem, the proposition that every matrix satisfies an algebraic equation of its own order: also called the principal proposition of matrices: given by the eminent English mathematician Arthur Cayley.—Cesaro's theorem, the proposition that if the vertices A, B, C of one triangle lie respectively on the sides (produced if necessary) B′C′, C′A′, A′B′ of a second triangle, which sides cut the sides of the first triangle in the points A″, B″, C″ respectively, and if S be the area of the first triangle, S′ that of the second, then given by E. Cesaro in 1885. It is an extension of Ceva's theorem.—Ceva's theorem, the proposition that if the straight lines connecting a point with the vertices of a triangle ABC meet the opposite sides in A′, B′, C′, the product of the segments $CB' \times BA' \times AC'$ is equal to the product $AB' \times BC' \times CA'$: given by Giovanni Ceva in 1678.—Chasles's theorem, the proposition that of a unidimensional family of conics in a plane the number which satisfy a simple condition is expressible in the form $\alpha\mu + \beta\nu$, where α and β depend solely on the nature of the condition, while μ is the number of conics of the family passing through an arbitrary point, and ν is the number touched by an arbitrary line: given in 1864 by M. Chasles (1793–1880) without proof.—Clairaut's theorem, the proposition that if the level surface of the earth is an elliptic spheroid symmetrical about the axis of rotation, then the compression or ellipticity is equal to the ratio of $\frac{5}{2}$ the equatorial centrifugal force less the excess of polar over equatorial gravity to the mean gravity: given in 1743 by Alexis Claude Clairaut (1713–65).—Clapeyron's theorem, the proposition that if a portion of a horizontal beam supported at three points A, B, C has uniform loads w_1 and w_2 on the parts AB and BC respectively, the lengths of which are respectively l_1 and l_2, and if α, β, γ are the bending moments at the three points of support, then given by B. P. E. Clapeyron (1799–1868): otherwise called the theorem of three moments.—Clausen's theorem. Same as Staudt's theorem.—Clausius's theorem, the proposition that the mean kinetic energy of a system in stationary motion is equal to its virial: given by R. J. E. Clausius (born 1822) in 1870: otherwise called the theorem of the virial.—Clebsch's theorem, the proposition that a curve of the nth order with $\frac{1}{2}(n-1)(n-2)$ double points is capable of rational parametric expression: given in 1866 by R. F. A. Clebsch (1833–72).—Clifford's theorem, the proposition that any two lines in a plane meet in a point, that the three points so determined by three lines taken two by two lie on a circle, that the four circles so determined by four lines taken three by three meet in a point, that the five points so determined by five lines taken four by four lie on a circle, that the six circles so determined by six lines taken five by five meet in a point, and so on indefinitely: given in 1871 by W. K. Clifford (1845–79).—Coriolis's theorem, the kinematical proposition that the acceleration of a point relative to a rigid system is the resultant of the absolute acceleration, the acceleration of attraction, and the acceleration of compound centrifugal force: named from its author, G. G. Coriolis (1792–1843).—Cotesian theorem. Same as Cotes's properties of the circle (which see, under circle).—Coulomb's theorem, the proposition that when a conductor is in electrical equilibrium the whole of its electricity is on the surface: given by C. A. Coulomb (1736–1806).—Crocchi's theorem, the proposition that if $\aleph_p$ denotes what $(x_1 + x_2 + \cdots + x_m)^p$ becomes when the coefficients of the development are replaced by unity, and if $s_p = x_1^p + x_2^p + x_3^p + \cdots + x_m^p$, then $$\begin{aligned}\aleph_0 s_1 &= \aleph_1 \\ \aleph_1 s_1 + \aleph_0 s_2 &= \aleph_2 \\ &\cdots \\ \aleph_{m-2}\, s_1 + \aleph_{m-3}\, s_2 + \cdots + \aleph_0 s_{m-1} &= (m-1)\,\aleph_{m-1}:\end{aligned}$$ given by L. Crocchi in 1880.—Crofton's theorem, the proposition that if L be the length of a plane convex contour, Ω its inclosed area, $d\omega$ an element of plane external to this, and θ the angle between two tangents from the point to which $d\omega$ refers, then

$$\frac{CB''.\,BA''.\,AC'' - AB''.\,BC''.\,CA''}{AB.\,BC.\,CA} = \frac{S'^2}{S^2} \cdot AA''.\,BB''.\,CC'':$$

$$\int(\theta - \sin\theta)\, d\omega = \tfrac{1}{2}L^2 - \pi\Omega:$$ given by Morgan W. Crofton in 1868. Certain symbolic expansions and a proposition in least squares are also so termed.—Culmann's theorem, the proposition that the corresponding sides of two funicular polygons which are in equilibrium under the same system of forces cut one another on a straight line.—D'Alembert's theorem, the proposition that every algebraic equation has a root: named from Jean le Rond d'Alembert (1717–83). See also D'Alembert's principle, under principle.—Dandelin's theorem, the proposition that if a sphere be inscribed in a right cone so as to touch any plane, its point of contact with that plane is a focus and the intersection with that plane of the plane of the circle of contact of sphere and cone is a directrix of the section of the cone by the first plane: named from G. P. Dandelin (1794–1847), who gave it in 1827; but he is said to have been anticipated by Quetelet. The theorem that the locus of a point on the tangent of a fixed conic at a constant distance from the point of contact is a stereographic projection of a spherical conic is by Dandelin.—Darboux's theorem, the proposition that if y is a function of x having superior and inferior limits within a certain interval of values of x, and if this interval is cut up into partial intervals $I_0, I_1, \ldots I_k$, in which the largest values of y are respectively $M_0, M_1, \ldots M_k$, then ΣMI will tend toward a fixed limit as the number of intervals is increased, without reference to the mode of dissection: named from its author, J. G. Darboux.—De Moivre's theorem. (a) The proposition that $(\cos\theta + i\sin\theta)^n = \cos n\theta + i\sin n\theta$: better called De Moivre's formula. (b) Same as De Moivre's property of the circle (which see, under circle). (c) A certain proposition in probabilities. All these are by Abraham De Moivre (1667–1754).—Desargues's theorem. (a) The proposition that when a quadrilateral is inscribed in a conic every transversal meets the two pairs of opposite sides and the conic in three pairs of points in involution. (b) The proposition that if two triangles ABC and A′B′C′ are so placed that the three straight lines through corresponding vertices meet in a point, then also the three points of intersection of corresponding sides (produced if necessary) lie in one straight line, and conversely. Both were discovered by Gérard Desargues (1593–1662).—Descartes's theorem. Same as Descartes's rule of signs (which see, under rule).—Diophantus's theorem, the proposition that no sum of three squares of integers is a sum of two such squares: given by a celebrated Greek arithmetician, probably of the third century.—Dostor's theorem, the proposition that in a plane triangle, where b, c are two of the sides, A the angle included between them, and δ the inclination of the bisector of this angle to the side opposite, $$\tan\delta = \frac{b+c}{b-c}\tan\tfrac{1}{2}A:$$ named from G. Dostor, by whom it was given in 1870. Certain corollaries from this in regard to the ellipse and hyperbola are also known as Dostor's theorems.—Du Bois Reymond's theorem, the proposition that if fa is a function of limited variation between $a = A$ and $a = B$, and if $\phi(a, n)$ is such a function that $\int_A^b \phi(a, n)da$ (where b is any number between A and B) has its modulus less than a fixed quantity independent of b and of n, and that when n increases indefinitely the integral tends toward a fixed limit G for all values of b between A and B, then $\int_A^b fa.\ \phi(a, n)da$ will tend uniformly to $Gf(A + 0)$ if $B > A$, and to $Gf(A - 0)$ if $B < A$: named from the German mathematician Paul du Bois Reymond.—Dupin's theorem, the proposition that three families of surfaces cutting one another orthogonally cut along lines of curvature: given by Charles Dupin (1784–1873).—Earnshaw's theorem, the proposition that an electrified body placed in an electric field cannot be in stable equilibrium.—Eisenstein's theorem, the proposition that when y in the algebraic equation $f(x, y) = 0$ is developed in powers of x, the coefficients, reduced to their lowest terms, have a finite number of factors in the denominator: given in 1852 by F. G. M. Eisenstein (1823–52).—Euler's theorem. (a) The proposition that at every point of a surface the radius of curvature ρ of a normal section inclined at an angle θ to one of the principal sections is determined by the equation

$$1/\rho = \cos^2\theta(1/\rho_1) + \sin^2\theta(1/\rho_2);$$

so that in a synclastic surface ρ_1 and ρ_2 are the maximum and minimum radii of curvature, but in an anticlastic surface, where they have opposite signs, they are the two minima radii. (b) The proposition that in every convex polyhedron (not true for one which inwraps the center more than once) the number of edges increased by two equals the sum of the numbers of faces and of summits. (c) One of a variety of theorems sometimes referred to as Euler's, with or without further specification: as, the theorem that $(xd/dx + yd/dy)^r f(x, y)^n = n^r f(x, y)^n$; the theorem, relating to the circle, called by Euler and others Fermat's geometrical theorem; the theorem on the law of formation of the approximations to a continued fraction; the theorem of the 2, 4, 8, and 16 squares; the theorem relating to the decomposition of a number into four positive cubes. All the above (except that of Fermat) are due to Leonhard Euler (1707–83).—Exponential theorem. See exponential.—Fagnani's theorem, a theorem given by Count G. C. di Fagnani (1682–1766) in 1716, now generally quoted under the following much-restricted form: the difference of two elliptic arcs AA′, aa', whose extremities A and a, A′ and a' form two couples of conjugate points, is equal to the difference of the distances from the center of the curve to the normals passing through the extremities of one of the two arcs.—Fassbender's theorem, the proposition that if α, β, γ are the angles the bisectors of the sides of a triangle make with those sides, then $\cot\alpha + \cot\beta + \cot\gamma = 0$.—Fermat's theorem. (a) The proposition that if p is a prime and a is prime to p, then $a^{p-1} - 1$ is divisible by p. Thus, taking $p = 7$ and $a = 10$, we have 999999 divisible by 7. The following is commonly referred to as Fermat's theorem generalized: if a is prime to n and ϕn is the totient of n, or number of numbers as small and prime to it, then $a^{\phi n} - 1$ is divisible by n. This and the following are due to the wonderful genius of Pierre Fermat (1608–65). (b) One of a number of arithmetical propositions which Fermat, owing to pressure of circumstances, could only jot down upon the margin of books or elsewhere, and the proofs of which remained unknown for the most part during two centuries, and which are still only partially understood—especially the following, called the last theorem of Fermat: the equation $x^n + y^n = z^n$, where n is an odd prime, has no solution in integers. (c) The proposition that, if from the extremities A and B of the diameter of a circle lines AD and BE be drawn at right angles to the diameter, on the same side of it, each equal to the straight line AI or BI from A or B to the middle point of the arc of the semicircle, and if through any point C in the circumference, on either side of the diameter AB, lines DCF, ECG be drawn from D and E to cut AB (produced if necessary) in F and G, then $AG^2 + BF^2 = AB^2$: distinguished as Fermat's geometrical theorem. This is shown in the figure by arcs from A as a center through G and from B as a center through F meeting at H on the circle. (d) The proposition that light travels along the quickest path.—Feuerbach's theorem, the proposition that the inscribed and three escribed circles of any triangle all touch the circle through the mid-sides: given in 1822 by K. W. Feuerbach (1800–34). The circle, often called the Feuerbach or nine-point circle, also passes through the feet of perpendiculars from the vertices upon the opposite sides and through the points midway between the orthocenter and the vertices. Its center bisects the distance between the orthocenter and the center of the circumscribed circle.—Fourier's theorem, the theorem that every rectilinear periodic motion is resolvable into a series of simple harmonic motions having periods the aliquot parts of that of their resultant: named after the French mathematician Baron J. B. J. Fourier (1768–1830).—Fundamental theorem of algebra, the proposition that every algebraic equation has a root, real or imaginary.—Fundamental theorem of arithmetic, the proposition that any lot of things the count of which in any order can be terminated is such that the count in every order can be terminated, and ends with the same number.—Galileo's theorem, the proposition that the area of a circle is a mean proportional between the areas of two similar polygons one circumscribed about the circle and the other isoperimetrical with it: given by Galileo Galilei (1564–1642).—Gaussian or Gauss's theorem, a name for different theorems relating to the curvature of surfaces, especially for the theorem that the measure of curvature of a surface depends only on the expression of the square of a linear element in terms of two parameters and their differential coefficients.—Geber's theorem, the proposition that in a spherical triangle ABC, right-angled at C, if b is the side opposite B, then $\cos B = \cos b \sin A$: believed to have been substantially given by an Arabian astronomer, Jâbir ibn Aflah of Seville, probably of the twelfth century.—Geiser's theorem, the proposition that two forms whose elements correspond one to one are projective: given by C. F. Geiser in 1870.—Goldbach's theorem, the proposition that every even number is the sum of two primes: named after C. Goldbach (1690–1764), by whom it is said to have been given.—Graves's theorem, the proposition that a pen stretching a thread loosely tied round an ellipse will describe a confocal ellipse: not properly a theorem, but an immediate corollary from a theorem by Leibnitz, drawn by Dr. Graves in 1841, and named after him as his most important achievement.—Green's theorems, certain theorems of fundamental importance in the theory of attractions, discovered by George Green (1793–1841). They are analytical expressions of the fact that the accumulation of any substance within a given region is the excess of what passes inward through its boundary over that which passes outward.—Guldin's theorems, two theorems expressing the superficies and solid contents of a solid of revolution: named after a Swiss mathematician, Guldin (1577–1643); but the theorems are ancient.—Hachette's theorem, the proposition that any ruled surface has normal to it along any generator a hyperbolic paraboloid having for directrices of its generators three normals to the regulus through three points of its given generator: given in 1832 by J. N. P. Hachette (1769–1834).—Hauber's theorem, the logical proposition that if a genus be divided into species in two ways, and each species in one mode of division is entirely contained under some species in the second mode, then the converse also holds: given in 1829 by K. F. Hauber (1775–1851).—Henneberg's theorem, the proposition that the necessary and sufficient condition that a minimal surface admitting a plane curve as its geodesic should be algebraic, is that this line should be the development of an algebraic curve: given in 1876 by L. Henneberg.—Herschel's theorem. (a) The development

$$fe^x = f1 + f(1+\Delta)0\cdot\frac{x}{1!} + f(1+\Delta)0^2\cdot\frac{x^2}{2!} + \cdots,$$ given in 1820 by Sir J. F. W. Herschel (1792–1872). (b) The proposition that forced vibrations follow the period of the exciting cause.—Hess's theorem, the proposition that the herpolhode has neither cusp nor inflection: given by W. Hess in 1880, and constituting an important correction of notions previously current among mathematicians. See herpolhode.—Hippocrates's theorem, the proposition that the area of a lune bounded by a semicircle and a quadrantal circular arc curved the same way is equal to that of the isosceles right triangle whose hypotenuse joins the cusps of the lune: named from its discoverer, the great Greek mathematician Hippocrates of Chios.—Holditch's theorem, the proposition that if a rod moves in a plane so as to return to its first position, and if A, B, C are any points fixed upon it, the distances AB, BC, CA being denoted by c, a, b, and if (A), (B), (C) are the areas described by A, B, C respectively, then given by the Rev. Hamnet Holditch (born 1800).—Ivory's theorem, the proposition that the attraction of any homogeneous ellipsoid upon an external point is to the attraction of the confocal ellipsoid passing through that point on the corresponding point of the first ellipsoid, both attractions being resolved in the direction of any principal plane, as the sections of the two ellipsoids made by this plane—and this according to whatever function of the distance the attractions may vary.—Jacobi's theorem. (a) The proposition that a function (having a finite number of values) of a single variable cannot have more than two periods. (b) The proposition that an equilibrium ellipsoid may have three unequal axes. (c) One of a variety of other propositions relating to the transformation of Laplace's equation, to the partial determinants of an adjunct system, to infinite series whose exponents are contained in two quadratic forms, to Hamilton's equations, to distance-correspondences for quadric surfaces, etc. All are named from their author, K. G. J. Jacobi (1804–51).—Joachimsthal's theorem, the proposition that if a line of curvature be a plane curve, its plane makes a constant angle with the tangent plane to the surface at any of the points where it meets it: given in 1846 by F. Joachimsthal (1818–61).—Jordan's theorem, the proposition that functions of n elements which are alternating or symmetrical relatively to some of them have fewer values than those which are not so; but this has exceptions when n is small.—Lagrange's theorem. (a) A rule for developing in series the values of an implicit function known to differ but little from a given explicit function: if $z = x + af z$, then

$$a(A) + b(B) + c(C) = \pi abc:$$

$$\phi z = \phi x + \sum_0^\infty n \frac{a^{n+1}}{(n+1)!} D^n[\phi' x.\ fx^{n+1}].$$

(b) The proposition that the order of a group is divisible by that of every group it contains: also called the fundamental theorem of substitutions. Both by J. L. Lagrange (1736–1813).—Lambert's theorem. (a) The proposition that the focal sector of an ellipse is equal to $$\frac{\text{Area ellipse}}{2\pi}(\chi - \sin\chi - \chi^1 + \sin\chi^1), \text{ where}$$

$$\sin\tfrac{1}{2}\chi = \tfrac{1}{2}\sqrt{(r + r^1 + c)/a}, \text{ and } \sin\tfrac{1}{2}\chi^1 = \tfrac{1}{2}\sqrt{(r + r^1 - c)/a},$$

r and r^1 being the focal radii of the extremities, c the chord, and a the semiaxis major. (b) A proposition relating to the apparent curvature of the geocentric path of a comet. Both are named from their author, J. H. Lambert (1728–77).—Lancret's theorem, in solid geometry, the proposition that along a line of curvature the variation in the angle between the tangent plane to the surface and the osculating plane to the curve is equal to the angle between the two osculating planes.—Landen's theorem, the proposition that every elliptic arc can be expressed by two hyperbolic arcs, and every hyperbolic arc by two elliptic arcs: given in 1755 by John Landen (1719–90).—Laplace's theorem, a slight modification of Lagrange's theorem.—Laurent's theorem, a rule for the development of a function in series, expressed by the formula

$$fx = \frac{1}{2\pi}\sum_0^\infty n x^n \int_0^{2\pi} f(\mathrm{R}e^{\theta i})/(\mathrm{R}^n e^{n\theta i})d\theta$$
$$+ \frac{1}{2\pi}\sum_0^\infty m \frac{1}{x^m}\int_0^{2\pi} f(\mathrm{R}'e^{\theta i})(\mathrm{R}'^n e^{n\theta i})d\theta,$$ where the modulus of x is comprised between R and R′: given by P. A. Laurent (1813–54).—Legendre's theorem, the proposition that if the sides of a spherical triangle are very small compared with the radius of the sphere and a plane triangle be formed whose sides are proportional to those of the spherical triangle, then each angle of the plane triangle is very nearly equal to the corresponding angle of the spherical triangle less one third of the spherical excess. This is near enough the truth for the purposes of geodesy: given by A. M. Legendre (1752–1833).—Leibnitz's theorem, a proposition concerning the successive differentials of a product: namely, that is equal to the same after development of $(D_u + D_v)^n$ by the binomial theorem, where D_u denotes differentiation as if u were constant, and D_v differentiation as if v were constant.—Lejeune-Dirichlet's theorem, a proposition discovered by the German arithmetician P. G. Lejeune-Dirichlet (1805–59), to the effect that any irrational may be represented by a fraction whose denominator m is a whole number less than any given number n with an error less than mn.—Lexell's theorem, one of two propositions expressing relations between the sides and angles of polygons: given in 1775 by A. J. Lexell (1740–84).—Lhuilier's theorem, the proposition that if a, b, c are the sides of a spherical triangle and E the spherical excess, then $$\tan^2\tfrac{1}{4}\mathrm{E} = \tan\tfrac{1}{4}(a + b + c) \times \tan\tfrac{1}{4}(a + b - c) \times \tan\tfrac{1}{4}(a - b + c) \times \tan\tfrac{1}{4}(-a + b + c):$$

$$\frac{d^n}{dx^n}uv = (D_u + D_v)^n uv$$

given by S. A. J. Lhuilier (1750–1840).—Listing's theorem, an equation between the numbers of points, lines, surfaces, and spaces, the cyclosis, and the periphraxis of a figure in space: given in 1847 by J. B. Listing. Also called the census theorem.—Lueroth's theorem, the proposition that a Riemann's surface may in every case be so constructed that there shall be no cross-lines except between consecutive sheets.—McClintock's theorem, a very general expansion formula by E. McClintock.—MacCullagh's theorem, the proposition that a triangle being inscribed in an ellipse, the diameter of its circumscribed circle is equal to the product of the elliptic diameters parallel to the sides divided by the product of the axes: discovered by the Irish mathematician James MacCullagh (1809–47), and published in 1855.—Maclaurin and Braikenridge's theorem, the proposition that n fixed points and $n-1$ fixed lines in one plane being given, the locus of the vertex of an n-gon whose other vertices lie on the fixed lines while its sides pass through the fixed points is a conic: given by Colin Maclaurin and G. Braikenridge in 1735.—Maclaurin's general theorem concerning curves, the proposition that if through any point O a line be drawn meeting a curve in n points, and at these points tangents be drawn, and if any other line through O cut the curve in R, R′, R″, etc., and the system of n tangents in r, r', r'', etc., then the sum of the reciprocals of the lines OR is equal to the sum of the reciprocals of the lines Or.—Maclaurin's theorem, a formula of the differential calculus, for the development of a function according to ascending powers of the variable: named after the Scotch mathematician Colin Maclaurin (1698–1746). It is an immediate corollary from Taylor's theorem, and is written $$\mathrm{F}x = \mathrm{F}0 + \mathrm{F}'0.x + \frac{1}{2!}\mathrm{F}''0.x^2 + \frac{1}{3!}\mathrm{F}'''0.x^3 + \cdots$$

Malus's theorem, the law of double refraction: given in 1810 by E. L. Malus (1775–1812).—Mannheim's theorem. Same as Schönemann's theorem (which see, below).—Mansion's theorem. Same as Smith's theorem (which see, below).—Matthew Stewart's theorem, one of sixty-four geometrical propositions given in 1746 by the philosopher Dugald Stewart's father (1717–85), especially that if three straight lines drawn from a point O are cut by a fourth line in the points A, B, C in order, then $(OA)^2BC - (OB)^2AC + (OC)^2AB = AB.BC.CA$.—Menelaus's theorem, the proposition that if a triangle QRS is cut by a transversal in C, A, and B, the product of the segments QA, RB, SC is equal to the product of the segments SA, QB, RC: given by the Greek geometer Menelaus, of the first century.—Meusnier's theorem, the proposition that the radius of curvature of an oblique section of a surface is equal to the radius of curvature of the normal section multiplied by the cosine of the inclination to the normal: given in 1775 by J. B. M. C. Meusnier de la Place (1754–93).—Minding's theorem, a certain proposition in statics.—Miquel's theorem, the proposition that if five straight lines and five parabolas are so drawn in a plane that each of the latter is touched by four of the former, and vice versa, then the foci of the parabolas lie on a circle: given by A. Miquel.—Mittag-Leffler's theorem, the proposition that if any series of isolated imaginary quantities, $a_0, a_1, \ldots a_n$, etc., be given, and a corresponding series of functions, $\psi_0, \psi_1, \ldots \psi_n$, etc., of the form

$$\psi_n = \sum_1^\infty m \mathrm{A}_{m,n}(z - a_n)^{-m},$$ a monodromic function fz can always be found having for critical points $a_0, a_1, \ldots a_n$, etc., and such that

$$fz = \phi_0 + \psi_0 = \cdots = \phi n + \psi n = \cdots,$$

ϕn being a function for which a_n is not a critical point: given by G. Mittag-Leffler.—Multinomial theorem. See multinomial.—Newton's theorem. (a) The proposition that if in the plane of a conic two lines be drawn through any point parallel to any two fixed axes, the ratio of the products of the segments is constant: given by Sir Isaac Newton (1642–1726) in 1711. (b) The proposition that the three diagonals of a quadrilateral circumscribed about a circle are all bisected by one diameter of the circle.—Painvin's theorem, the proposition that a tetrahedron Fermat's Geometrical Theorem.

of which a vertex is pole of the opposite base relatively to a quadric surface, that base being a conjugate triangle relative to its section of the quadric, is a conjugate tetrahedron.—Pappus's theorem. (a) The proposition that if a quadrangle is inscribed in a conic, the product of the distances of any point on the curve from one pair of opposite sides is to the product of its distances from another such pair in a constant ratio: so called owing to its connection with Pappus's problem. (b) One of the two propositions that the surface of a solid of revolution is equal to the product of the perimeter of the generating plane figure by the length of the path described by the center of gravity, and that the volume of such a solid is equal to the area of the plane figure multiplied by the same length of path. Various other theorems contained in the collection of the Greek mathematician Pappus, of the third century, are sometimes called by his name.—Particular theorem, a theorem which extends only to a particular quantity.—Pascal's theorem, the proposition that the three intersections of pairs of opposite sides of a hexagon inscribed in a conic lie on a straight line: given by Blaise Pascal (1623–62) in 1640. The hexagon itself is called a Pascal's hexagon or hexagram, and the straight line is called a Pascal's line.—Picard's theorem. (a) The proposition that every function which in the whole plane of complex quantity except in p straight lines is uniform and continuous, is equal to the sum of p uniform functions, each of which has but one such line. (b) A certain proposition concerning uniform functions connected by an algebraic relation.—Pohlke's theorem, the proposition that any three limited straight lines drawn in a plane from one point form an oblique parallel projection of a system of three orthogonal and equal axes: given by K. W. Pohlke in 1853. Also known as the fundamental theorem of axonometry.—Poisson's theorem, a rule for forming integrals of a partial differential equation from two given integrals.—Polynomial theorem. See polynomial.—Poncelet's theorem. (a) The proposition that if there be a closed polygon inscribed in a given conic and circumscribed about another given conic, there is an infinity of such polygons. (b) The proposition that a quantity of the form $R = \sqrt{u^2 + v^2}$ cannot differ from $\alpha u + \beta v$ by more than $R\tan^2\frac{1}{2}\epsilon$, where $\alpha = \cos(\theta+\epsilon)/\cos^2\frac{1}{2}\epsilon$, $\beta = \sin(\theta+\epsilon)/\cos^2\frac{1}{2}\epsilon$, $\epsilon = \frac{1}{2}(\Theta - \theta)$, $\tan\Theta > u/v > \tan\theta$. Both were given by General J. V. Poncelet (1788–1877).—Ptolemy's theorem, the proposition on that if four points A, B, C, D lie on a circle in this cyclical order, then AB. CD + AD. BC = AC. DB.: given by the Egyptian Greek mathematician of the second century, Claudius Ptolemy.—Puiseux's theorem, the proposition that a function of a complex variable which is thoroughly uniform and satisfies an algebraic equation whose coefficients are rational integral functions of the same variable, is a rational function of that variable: named after V. A. Puiseux (1820–83), by whom it was given in 1851.—Pythagorean theorem, the Pythagorean proposition (which see, under Pythagorean).—Reciprocal theorem, a theorem of geometry analogous to another theorem, but relating to planes instead of points, and vice versa, or in a plane to straight lines instead of points, and vice versa. Thus, Pascal's and Brianchon's theorems are reciprocal to one another.—Ribaucour's theorem, given a pseudospherical surface of unit curvature, if in every tangent plane a circle of unit radius be described about the point of contact as center, these circles will be orthogonal to a family of pseudospherical surfaces of unit radius belonging to a triple orthogonal system of which the other two families are envelops of spheres: given by A. Ribaucour in 1870.—Riemann's theorem, a certain theorem relative to series of corresponding points—for example, that two projective series of points lie upon curves of the same deficiency. In its generality the proposition is called the theorem of Riemann and Roch, or of Riemann, Roch, and Nöther. It was first given by G. F. B. Riemann (1826–67) in 1857, generally demonstrated by Roch in 1865, and extended to surfaces by Nöther in 1886.—Robert's theorem. (a) The proposition that the geodesics joining any point on a quadric surface to two umbilics make equal angles with the lines of curvature at that point: given, with various other propositions relating to the asymptotic lines and lines of curvature of quadrics, by Michael Roberts in 1846. (b) The proposition that if a point be taken on each of the edges of any tetrahedron and a sphere be described through each vertex and the points assumed on the three adjacent edges, the four spheres will meet in a point: given by Samuel Roberts in 1881.—Rodrigues's theorem, the proposition that

Rolle's theorem, the proposition that between any two real roots of an equation, algebraic or transcendental, if the first derived function is finite and continuous in the interval, it must vanish an odd number of times: given in 1689 by Michel Rolle (1652–1719).—Scherk's theorem, the proposition that the Eulerian numbers in Arabic notation end alternately with 1 and 5.—Schönemann's theorem, the proposition that if four points of a rigid body slide over four fixed surfaces, all the normals to surfaces that are loci of other points of the body pass through two fixed straight lines: published under Steiner's auspices in 1855, but not noticed, and rediscovered by A. Mannheim in 1866 (whence long called Mannheim's theorem); but Schönemann's paper was reprinted in Borchardt's Journal in 1880.—Slonimsky's theorem, the proposition that if the successive multiples of a number expressed in the Arabic notation are written regularly under one another, there are only 28 different columns of figures which have to be added to the last figures of the successive multiples of a digit to get the numbers written in any vertical column.—Sluze's theorem, the proposition that the volume of the solid generated by the revolution of a common cissoid about its asymptote is equal to the volume of the anchor-ring generated by the revolution of the primitive circle about the same axis. This theorem, which is true for any kind of cissoid, and is susceptible of further generalization, was given in 1668 by the Baron de Sluze (1622–85).—Smith's theorem, the proposition that $\Sigma \pm (1,1)(2,2)\ldots(n,n) = \phi 1.\ \phi 2.\ldots.\ \phi n$, where the left-hand side is a symmetrical determinant, (p, q) denoting the greatest common divisor of the integers p and q, and ϕp being the totient of p, or number of numbers at least as small as p and prime to it: given in 1876 by the eminent Irish mathematician H. J. S. Smith (1826–83). The theorem as generalized by Paul Mansion in 1877 is called Smith and Mansion's theorem.—Staudt's theorem, the proposition that any Bernoulli number, B_n, is equal to an integer minus

$$2^{-1} + \alpha^{-1} + \beta^{-1} + \ldots + \lambda^{-1},$$ where α, β, etc., are all the prime numbers one greater than the double of divisors of n: given in 1840 by K. G. C. von Staudt (1798–1867).—Steiner's theorem, one of a large number of propositions in geometry given by Jakob Steiner (1796–1863), who was probably the greatest geometrical genius that ever lived; but the necessities of life prevented the publication of by far the greater part of his discoveries, until his health was shattered, and most of those that were printed (in 1826 and the following years) were given without proofs, and remained an enigma to mathematicians until 1862, when Luigi Cremona demonstrated most of them.—Stirling's theorem, the proposition that

$$\phi(x+h) - \phi x = h\phi' x + \tfrac{1}{2}h[\phi'(x+h) - \phi' x]$$
$$-\frac{B_2}{2!}h^2[\phi''(x+h) - \phi'' x] + \frac{B_4}{4!}h^4[\phi^{iv}(x+h) - \phi^{iv} x] - \ldots:$$ given by James Stirling (1696–1770).—Sturm's theorem, a proposition in the theory of equations for determining the number of real roots of an equation between given limits: given by the French mathematician J. C. F. Sturm (1803–55) in 1835.—Sylow's theorem. See Cauchy's theorem (b), above.—Sylvester's theorem. (a) An extension of Newton's rule on the limits of the roots of an algebraic equation. (b) The proposition that every quaternary cubic is the sum of the cubes of five linear forms. (c) The proposition that if λ_1, λ_2, etc., are the latent roots of a matrix m, then

$$\Phi m = \Sigma \frac{(m-\lambda_2)(m-\lambda_3)\ldots}{(\lambda_1-\lambda_2)(\lambda_1-\lambda_3)\ldots}\Phi\lambda_1:$$ given by the great algebraist J. J. Sylvester (1814–1897).—Tanner's theorem, a property of pfaffians, $$\sum_{i}^{2m} P_{1,i} P_{i+1,1}\ldots_{2m,2,\ldots i-1} = PP_{1,2,\ldots 2m}:$$ given by H. M. L. Tanner in 1879.—Taylor's theorem, a formula of most extensive application in analysis, discovered by Dr. Brook Taylor, and published by him in 1715. It is to the following effect: let u represent any function whatever of the variable quantity x; then if x receive any increment, as h, let u become u'; then we shall have $u' = u + \frac{du}{dx}\cdot\frac{h}{1} + \frac{d^2u}{dx^2}\cdot\frac{h^2}{1\cdot2} + \frac{d^3u}{dx^3}\cdot\frac{h^3}{1\cdot2\cdot3} + \frac{d^4u}{dx^4}\cdot\frac{h^4}{1\cdot2\cdot3\cdot4} + \ldots$

—Theorem of aggregation. See aggregation.—Universal theorem, a theorem which extends to any quantity without restriction.—Wallis's theorem, the proposition that

$$\pi/2 = (2^2/3^2).(4^2/5^2).(6^2/7^2).(8^2/9^2), \text{ etc.},$$

named after the discoverer, John Wallis (1616–1703).—Weierstrass's fundamental theorem, the proposition that every analytical function subject to an addition theorem is either an algebraic function, or an algebraic function of an exponential, or an algebraic function of the Weierstrassian function $\wp$: given by Karl Weierstrass (1815–1897).—Weingarten's theorem. See Betti's theorem, above.—Wilson's theorem, the proposition that if p is a prime number, the continued product 1.2.3. . . $(p-1)$ increased by 1 is divisible by p, and if not, not: discovered by Judge John Wilson (1741–93), and published by Waring.—Wronski's theorem, an expansion for a function of a root of an equation.—Yvon-Villarceau's theorem, a general proposition of dynamics, expressed by the formula

$$\Sigma mv^2 = \tfrac{1}{2}\frac{d^2\Sigma mr^2}{dt^2} + \Sigma f\Delta - \Sigma(Xx + Yy + Zz),$$ where v is the velocity, r the radius vector of the point whose mass is m and its coördinates x, y, z, while X, Y, Z are the components of the force, f the force, and Δ the distance of two particles: given in 1872 by A. J. F. Yvon-Villarceau (1813–83). It much resembles the theorem of the virial. = Syn. See inference.

theorem (thē′ō-rem), v. t. [< theorem, n.] To reduce to or formulate as a theorem. [Rare.]

> To attempt theorising on such matters would profit little; they are matters which refuse to be theoremed and diagramed, which Logic ought to know that she cannot speak of. Carlyle.

theorematic (thē″ō-re-mat′ik), a. [< Gr. θεωρηματικός, of or pertaining to a theorem, < θεώρημα, a theorem: see theorem.] Pertaining to a theorem; comprised in a theorem; consisting of theorems: as, theorematic truth.

theorematical (thē″ō-re-mat′i-kal), a. [< theorematic + -al.] Same as theorematic.

theorematist (thē-ō-rem′a-tist), n. [< Gr. θεώρημα(τ-), a theorem, + -ist.] One who forms theorems.

theoremic (thē-ō-rem′ik), a. [< theorem + -ic.] Theorematic.

theoretic (thē-ō-ret′ik), a. and n. [= F. théorétique, < NL. theoreticus,* < Gr. θεωρητικός, of or pertaining to theory, < θεωρία, theory: see theory.] I. a. Same as theoretical.

> Mankind is a science defies definitions.
> Burns, Fragment inscribed to C. J. Fox.

II. n. Same as theoretics. S. H. Hodgson, ★Time and Space, § 68. [Rare.]

theoretical (thē-ō-ret′i-kal), a. [< theoretic + -al.] 1. Having the object of knowledge (θεωρητόν) as its end; concerned with knowledge only, not with accomplishing anything or producing anything; purely scientific; speculative.

> This is the original, proper, and best meaning of the word. Aristotle divides all knowledge into productive (art) and unproductive (science), and the latter into that which aims at accomplishing something (practical science) and that which aims only at understanding its object, which is theoretical science. This distinction, which has descended to our times (but with practical science and art joined together), diminishes in importance as science advances, all the sciences finding practical applications.
>
> Weary with the pursuit of academical studies, he [Collins] no longer confined himself to the search of theoretical knowledge, but commenced, the scholar of humanity, to study nature in her works, and man in society.
> Langhorne, On Collins's Ode, The Manners.

2. Dealing with or making deductions from imperfect theory, and not correctly indicating the real facts as presenting themselves in experience. All the practical sciences that have been pursued with distinguished success proceed by deductions from hypotheses known not to be strictly true. This is the analytical method, of which modern civilization is the fruit. In some cases the hypotheses are so far from the truth that the results have to receive corrections. In such cases the uncorrected result is called theoretical, the corrected result practical.

> What logic was to the philosopher legislation was to the statesman and moralist, a practical, as the other was a theoretical, casuistry.
> Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 211.

3. In Kantian terminology, having reference to what is or is not true, as opposed to practical, or having reference to what ought or may innocently be done or left undone.—Theoretical agriculture, arithmetic, chemistry. See the nouns.—Theoretical cognition, cognition either not in the imperative mood or not leading to such an imperative; knowledge of what the laws of nature prescribe or admit, not of what the law of conscience prescribes or permits.—Theoretical geometry. See geometry.—Theoretical intellect. See intellect, 1.—Theoretical logic. Same as abstract logic (which see, under logic).—Theoretical meteorology, philosophy, proposition, reality, reason, etc. See the nouns.

theoretically (thē-ō-ret′i-kal-i), adv. In a theoretic manner; in or by theory; from a theoretical point of view; speculatively: opposed to practically.

theoretician (thē″ō-re-tish′an), n. [< theoretic + -ian.] A theorist; a theorizer; one who is expert in the theory of a science or art.

theoretics (thē-ō-ret′iks), n. [Pl. of theoretic (see -ics).] The speculative parts of a science.

theorisation, theorise, etc. See theorization, etc.

theorist (thē′ō-rist), n. [< theor-y + -ist.] One who forms theories; one given to theory and speculation; a speculatist. It is often used with the implication of a lack of practical capacity.

The greatest theorists in matters of this nature . . . have given the preference to such a form of government as that which obtains in this kingdom.
Addison, Freeholder, No. 51.

Truths that the theorist could never reach,
And observation taught me, I would teach.
Cowper, Progress of Error, l. 11.

That personal ambition . . . in which lurked a certain efficacy, that might solidify him from a theorist into the champion of some practicable cause.
Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xii.

theorization (thē″ō-ri-zā′shọn), n. [< theorize + -at-ion.] The act or the product of theorizing; the formation of a theory or theories; speculation. Also spelled theorisation.

The notorious imperfection of the geological record ought to warn us against . . . hasty theorization.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XII. 117.

theorize (thē′ō-rīz), v. i.; pret. and pp. theorized, ppr. theorizing. [< theor-y + -ize.] To form a theory or theories; form opinions solely by theory; speculate. Also spelled theorise.

The merest artisan needs to theorize, i. e. to think — to think beforehand, to foresee; and that must be done by the aid of general principles, by the knowledge of laws.
J. F. Clarke, Self Culture, p. 139.

theorizer (thē′ō-rī-zėr), n. [< theorize + -er[1].] A theorist. Also spelled theoriser.

With the exception, in fact, of a few late absolutist theorizers in Germany, this is, perhaps, the truth of all others the most harmoniously re-echoed by every philosopher of every school. Sir W. Hamilton.

theorizing (thē′ō-rī-zing), n. [Verbal n. of theorize, v.] The act or process of forming a theory or theories; speculation.

Whatever may be thought of the general theorizings of the last two, it is clear that their method is not the patiently inductive one of Darwin.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXV. 754.

theorizing (thē′ō-rī-zing), p. a. Speculative.

Gallatin had drifted further than his school-mate from the theorizing tastes of his youth.
H. Adams, Albert Gallatin, p. 519.

★ theory (thē′ō-ri), n.; pl. theories (-riz). [Early mod. E. theorie; < OF. theorie, F. théorie = Sp. teoría = Pg. theoria = It. teoria = D. G. theorie = Sw. The pens of men may sufficiently expatiate without these singularities of villany; for, as they increase the hatred of vice in some, so do they enlarge the theory of wickedness in all. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vii. 19.

2. Perception or consideration of the relations of the parts of an ideal construction, which is supposed to render completely or in some measure intelligible a fact or thing which it resembles or to which it is analogous; also, the ideal construction itself. Thus, political economists, in order to explain the phenomena of trade, suppose two or three men, actuated by calculation of interests alone, to be placed on a desert island, or some other simple situation. The perception of how such men would behave constitutes a theory which will explain some observed facts. In precisely the same way, an engineer who has to build a machine or a bridge imagines a structure much more simple than that which he is to make, and from the calculation of the forces and resistances of the ideal structure, which is theory, infers what will best combine economy with strength in the real structure.

The Queen confers her titles and degrees. . . .
Then, blessing all: "Go, children of my care!
To practice now from theory repair."
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 580.

They [the English] were much more perfect in the theory than in the practice of passive obedience.
Macaulay, Sir James Mackintosh.

3. An intelligible conception or account of how something has been brought about or should be done. A theory, in this sense, will most commonly, though not always, be of the nature of a hypothesis; but with good writers a mere conjecture is hardly dignified by the name of a theory. Theory is often opposed to fact, as having its origin in the mind and not in observation.

Conjectures and theories are the creatures of men, and will be found very unlike the creatures of God.
Reid, Inquiry into Human Mind, i. 1.

Divine kindness to others is essentially kindness to myself. This is no theory; it is the fact confirmed by all experience. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 89.

The distinction of Fact and Theory is only relative. Events and phenomena, considered as particulars which may be colligated by Induction, are Facts; considered as generalities already obtained by colligation of other Facts, they are Theories.
Whewell, Philos. Induct. Sciences, I. p. xli.

For she was cramm'd with theories out of books.
Tennyson, Princess, Conclusion.

4. Plan or system; scheme; method. [Rare.]

If they had been themselves to execute their own theory in this church, . . . they would have seen, being nearer.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 29.

5. In math., a series of results belonging to one subject and going far toward giving a unitary and luminous view of that subject: as, the theory of functions.—6. Specifically, in music, the science of composition, as distinguished from practice, the art of performance.—Ampère's theory, an electrodynamic theory proposed by André Marie Ampère, according to which every molecule of a magnetic substance is supposed to be traversed by a closed electric current. Before magnetization the combined effect of these currents is zero, but by the magnetizing process they are supposed to be brought more or less fully into a parallel position; their resultant effect is then equivalent to a series of parallel currents traversing the exterior surface of the magnet in a plane perpendicular to its axis and in a certain definite direction, which when the south pole is turned toward the observer is that of the hands of a watch. These hypothetical currents are called the Amperian currents. This theory is based upon the close analogy between a solenoid traversed by an electric current and a magnet. (See solenoid.) Ampère conceived that the magnetic action of the earth is the result of currents circulating within it, or at its surface, from east to west, in planes parallel to the magnetic equator.—Antiphlogistic theory. See antiphlogistic.—Atomic theory. See atomic.—Automatic theory. Same as automatism, 2.—Binary theory of salts. See binary.—Brunonian theory. See Brunonian.—Carnot's theory, the theory that heat is an indestructible substance which does work by a fall of its temperature, as water does work by descending from one level to another. theosoph (thē′ō-sof), n. [= F. théosophe = Sp. teósofo, < ML. theosophus, a theologian, < LGr. (eccl.) θεόσοφος, wise in things concerning God, < θεός, god, + σοφός, wise. Cf. theosophy.] A theosophist.

Within the Christian period we may number among the Theosophs Neo-Platonists, &c. Chambers's Encyc., IX. 400.

theosopher (thē-os′ō-fėr), n. [< theosoph-y + -er[1].] A theosophist.

Have an extraordinary care also of the late Theosophers, that teach men to climbe to Heaven upon a ladder of lying figments. N. Ward, Simple Cobler, p. 18.

The ascetic, celibate theosopher. Kingsley, Hypatia, xxii.

theosophic (thē-ō-sof′ik), a. [< theosoph-y + -ic.] Same as theosophical.

theosophical (thē-ō-sof′i-kạl), a. [< theosophic + -al.] Of or pertaining to theosophy or theosophists.

A theosophical system may also be pantheistic, in tendency if not in intention; but the transcendent character of its Godhead definitely distinguishes it from the speculative philosophies which might otherwise seem to fall under the same definition. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 278.

From the end of the year 1783 to the beginning of the year 1788 there existed a society entitled "The Theosophical Society, instituted for the Purpose of promoting the Heavenly Doctrines of the New Jerusalem, by translating, printing, and publishing the Theological Writings of the Honourable Emanuel Swedenborg."
N. and Q., 7th ser., XI. 127.

theosophically (thē-ō-sof′i-kạl-i), adv. In a theosophic manner; toward, or from the point of view of, theosophy.

The occurrence being viewed as history or as myth according as the interpreter is theosophically or critically inclined. W. R. Smith.

theosophism (thē-os′ō-fizm), n. [< theosoph-y + -ism.] Theosophical tenets or belief.

Many traces of the spirit of Theosophism may be found through the whole history of philosophy; in which nothing is more frequent than fanatical and hypocritical pretensions to Divine illumination.
Enfield, Hist. Philosophy, ix. 3.

theosophist (thē-os′ō-fist), n. [< theosoph-y + -ist.] One who professes to possess divine illumination; a believer in theosophy.

I have observed generally of chymists and theosophists, as of several other men more palpably mad, that their thoughts are carried much to astrology.
Dr. H. More, A Brief Discourse of Enthusiasm, xlv.

Theosophist [is] a name which has been given, though not with any very definite meaning, to that class of mystical religious thinkers and writers who aim at displaying, or believe themselves to possess, a knowledge of the divinity and his works by supernatural inspiration. In this they differ from the mystics, who have been styled theopathetic, whose object is passively to recover the supposed communication of the divinity and expatiate on the results. The best-known names at this day of the theosophic order are those of Jacob Böhme, Madame Guyon, Swedenborg, and Saint-Martin. Schelling and others, who regarded the foundation of their metaphysical tenets as resting on divine intuition, have been called theosophists, but with less exactness.
Brande and Cox, Dict. Sci., Lit., and Art.

theosophistical (thē-os-ō-fis′ti-kạl), a. [< theosophist + -ic-al.] Theosophical.

theosophize (thē-os′ō-fīz), v. i.; pret. and pp. theosophized, ppr. theosophizing. [< theosoph-y + -ize.] To treat of or practise theosophy.

theosophy (thē-os′ō-fi), n. [= F. théosophie, < LGr. θεοσοφία, knowledge of things divine, wisdom concerning God, < θεόσοφος, wise in things concerning God: see theosoph.] Knowledge of things divine; a philosophy based upon a claim of special insight into the divine nature, or a special divine revelation. It differs from most philosophical systems in that they start from phenomena and deduce therefrom certain conclusions concerning God, whereas theosophy starts with an assumed knowledge of God, directly obtained, through spiritual intercommunion, and proceeds therefrom to a study and explanation of phenomena.

But Xenophanes his theosophy, or divine philosophy, is most fully declared by Simplicius.
Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 377.

Theosophy is distinguished from mysticism, speculative theology, and other forms of philosophy and theology, to which it bears a certain resemblance, by its claims of direct divine inspiration, immediate divine revelation, and its want, more or less conspicuous, of dialectical exposition. It is found among all nations — Hindus, Persians, Arabs, Greeks (the later Neo-Platonism), and Jews (Cabala) — and presents itself variously under the form of magic (Agrippa of Nettesheim, Paracelsus), or vision (Swedenborg, Saint Martin), or rapt contemplation (Jacob Boehme, Oettinger).
Schaff-Herzog, Encyc., p. 2348.

The philosophies or theosophies that close the record of Greek speculation. E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 17.

It is characteristic of theosophy that it starts with an explication of the Divine essence, and endeavours to deduce the phenomenal universe from the play of forces within the Divine nature itself. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 278.

Theosophy is but a recrudescence of a belief widely proclaimed in the twelfth century, and held to in some form by many barbaric tribes. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 546.

theotechnic (thē-ō-tek′nik), a. [< theotechn-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the action or intervention of the gods; operated or carried on by or as by the gods.

Tennyson, Holy Grail.

therefor (ŦHĂR-fôr′), adv. [< ME. therefor; a form of therefore, now used only as if a modern formation, < there + for, for that: see therefore.] For this or for that; for it: as, the building and so much land as shall be necessary therefor.

therefore (in defs. 1, 2, 3, ŦHĂR-fōr′; in def. 4, ŦHĂR′fōr, sometimes ŦHėr′fōr), adv. [< ME. therfore, therfor, tharfore, thorfore, thorvore (= OFries. therfore (= D. daarvoor = MLG. darvore = G. dafür = Sw. derför = Dan. derfor); < there + fore. Cf. therefor.] 1†. For that; for this; for it; therefor.

Also, that alle the costages that be mad aboute hym be mad good of the box, 3if he were nat of power to paie therfore hymself. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 7.

We fetched her round at last. Thank the Lord therefore. Tennyson, Queen Mary, iv. 3.

2†. In return or recompense for this or for that.

We have forsaken all, and followed thee; what shall we have therefore? Mat. xix. 27.

An if I could [tell], what should I get therefore?
Shak., M. N. D., iii. 2. 78.

3†. For that purpose or cause.

Thei anoynten here Hondes and here Feet with a juyce made of Snayles and of othere thinges, made therfore.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 169.

Thei wende verily that fendes were fallen a-mong the hoste. But thei were so bolde and so chiualrouse that ther-fore thei wolde not be discounfited.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 625.

4. For this or for that reason; on that account: referring to something previously stated; consequently; by consequence.

In Normandy there's little or no Wine at all grows, therefore the common Drink of that Country is Cyder.
Howell, Letters, ii. 54.

I have married a wife, and therefore I cannot come.
Luke xiv. 20.

The largeness of this short text [Render therefore to all men their dues] consists in that word therefore; therefore because you have been so particularly taught your particular duties, therefore perform them, therefore practise them. Donne, Sermons, ix.

He blushes; therefore he is guilty. Spectator.

Line for line and point for point, your dominion is as great as theirs, though without fine names. Build, therefore, your own world. Emerson, Nature, p. 92.

=Syn. 4. Therefore, Wherefore, Accordingly, Consequently, Then, So. All these words draw a conclusion or infer a consequence from what immediately precedes; they are all affected by their derivation or original meaning. Therefore, for this or that reason, on that account; wherefore, for which reason, on which account. Therefore is the most formal of the words, and is consequently most used in mathematics, logic, and elaborate argument. The use of wherefore for therefore is not to be commended, as it is considered a Latinism to use a relative pronoun or its derivative for a demonstrative or its derivative in carrying on a thought; the development of this principle is modern, and gives to the demonstrative use of wherefore a tone of quaintness. Accordingly and consequently are more common in essay and narrative writing; then and so in conversation, where brevity is most studied. The last four are more used to indicate practical sequences.

therefro† (ŦHĂR-frō′), adv. [< ME. therefro; < there + fro.] From that.

And hudden [hid] here egges whan thei there-fro wente, therianthropic (thē″ri-an-throp'ik), a. [< Gr. θηρίον, a wild beast, + ἄνθρωπος, man, + -ic.] Characterized by imagination or worship of superhuman beings represented as combining the forms of men and beasts.

Purified magical religions, in which animistic ideas still play a prominent part, but which have grown up to a therianthropic polytheism. Encyc. Brit., XX. 367.

Theridiidæ (thē-ri-dī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Theridium + -idæ.] A family of retitelarian spiders, typified by the genus Theridium. Most of them spin webs consisting of irregularly intersecting threads. Many species are known, and 19 genera are represented in Europe alone.

Theridium (thē-rid'i-um), n. [NL. (Walckenaer, 1805), < Gr. θηρίδιον, a little animal.] A genus of spiders, typical of the family Theridiidæ.

Therina (thē-rī'nä), n. [NL. (Hübner, 1816, as Therinia), < Gr. θήρ, a wild beast.] A genus of geometrid moths, of the subfamily Ennominæ, having the wings broad and slightly angular and the male antennæ plumose. The few species are ocherous or whitish in color. T. fervidaria is common throughout the northern United States and Canada, and occurs as far south as Georgia, where its larva feeds on the snowdrop-tree. In the north it feeds on spruce.

Therina fervidaria, natural size.

theriodont (thē'ri-ō-dont), a. and n. [Also therodont; < Gr. θηρίον, a wild beast, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] I. a. Having teeth like a mammal's, as a fossil reptile; specifically, of or pertaining to the order Theriodontia.

II. n. A member of the Theriodontia.

Theriodontia (thē″ri-ō-don'shi-ä), n. pl. [NL.: see theriodont.] An order of extinct Reptilia, so called from the resemblance of the dentition in some respects to that of mammals. There was in some forms a large laniariform canine tooth on each side of each jaw, separating definable incisors from the molar teeth. The head somewhat resembled a turtle's; the vertebræ were amphicœlous, the limbs ambulatory with well-developed pectoral and pelvic arches; the humerus had a supracondylar foramen. Many genera have been described from the Permian and Triassic of Africa, as Dicynodon, Cynodraco, Tigrisuchus, and Galeosaurus. The original application of the term has been modified by subsequent discoveries; it has become an inexact synonym of Theromorpha, and has been used instead of Pelycosauria. Also Theriodonta and Therodontia. See cut under Dicynodon.

theriomancy (thē'ri-ō-man-si), n. [< Gr. θηρίον, a wild beast, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination by observation of beasts.

Theriomorpha† (thē″ri-ō-môr'fä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of theriomorphus: see theriomorphous.] In Owen's system of classification, one of three suborders of Batrachia, contrasted with Ophiomorpha and Ichthyomorpha. See Theromorpha. Also Therimorpha.

theriomorphic (thē″ri-ō-môr'fik), a. [< Gr. θηρίον, a wild beast, + μορφή, form.] Having the form of a wild beast. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 150. [Rare.]

theriomorphous (thē″ri-ō-môr'fus), a. [< NL. theriomorphus, < Gr. θηριόμορφος, having the form of a beast, < θηρίον, a wild beast, + μορφή, form.] 1. Beast-like; resembling an ordinary quadruped or mammal: as, the theriomorphous reptiles of the Permian period.—2. Specifically, of or pertaining to the Theriomorpha.

theriopod (thē'ri-ō-pod), a. and n. Same as theropod.

theriotomy (thē-ri-ot'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. θηρίον, a wild beast, + -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] The dissection of beasts; the anatomy of other animals than man; zoötomy.

(and F.) thermes = Sp. termas = Pg. thermas = It. terme, pl., < L. thermæ, pl., < Gr. θέρμαι, hot baths, pl. of θέρμη, heat, < θερμός, warm (= L. formus, warm), < θέρειν, make hot or dry, burn.] 1†. A hot bath; by extension, any bath or pool.

O cleer Therms,
If so your Waves be cold, what is it warms,
Nay, burns my hart?
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Trophies.

2. In physics, a thermal unit, the water-gram-degree or (small) calory, the amount of heat required to raise one gram of water at its maximum density through one degree centigrade.

thermæ (thėr'mē), n. pl. [L., < Gr. θέρμαι, hot baths, pl. of θέρμη, heat: see therm[2].] Hot springs or hot baths; particularly, one of the public bathing-establishments of the ancient Greeks and Romans, which were universally patronized, and of which abundant remains survive, the chief of them in Rome. The ancient baths were originally of the simplest character, but with the advance of time became, after the Periclean age, more and more luxurious. Among the Romans their use did not become general until toward the close of the republic, but was a popular passion throughout the empire. In their fully developed form the Roman thermæ were of great size and lavish magnificence, including dressing-rooms, reservoirs, basins of hot and cold water, hot-air chambers, courts for exercising, gardens for rest, lecture-rooms, libraries, and every other elaboration of architecture and of luxury. See plan under bath[1].

thermal (thėr'mal), a. [= F. thermal = Sp. termal = Pg. thermal = It. termale, < NL. thermalis*, < Gr. θέρμη, heat, pl. θέρμαι, hot baths: see therm[2].] 1. Of or pertaining to heat.—2. Of or pertaining to thermæ.

Next in splendour to the amphitheatres of the Romans were their great thermal establishments; in size they were perhaps even more remarkable, and their erection must certainly have been more costly.
J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 331.

Thermal alarm, a name applied to a variety of signals or alarms for indicating a rise in temperature, as a hot-bearing alarm, a temperature alarm, or a thermo-electric alarm (see thermo-electric).—Thermal analysis, the analysis of the radiation from any source, as the sun or an electric light, with a view to determining the relative intensity of the luminous and non-luminous rays or the distribution of heat in different parts of the spectrum.—Thermal capacity, chemistry, equilibrium. See the nouns.—Thermal equator, the belt around the earth having the highest mean annual temperature; this belt oscillates between latitude 0° in January and latitude 20° north in July. The average annual location is at latitude 10° north, and the average annual temperature for this belt is 27.1° C., according to Batchelder, but 26.4° C., according to Spitaler.—Thermal springs, thermal waters, hot springs. See spring, 7.—Thermal unit. See unit.

thermally (thėr'mal-i), adv. In a thermal manner; with reference to heat.

therm-ammeter (thėr-mam'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. ammeter.] An instrument for measuring the strength of an electric current (in amperes) by means of the heat which it generates.

thermantidote (thėr-man'ti-dōt), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + ἀντίδοτον, antidote: see antidote.] An apparatus used in India for cooling the air. It consists of a revolving wheel fitted to a window, and usually inclosed in wet tatties, through which the air is forced.

Low and heavy punkahs swing overhead; a sweet breathing of wet khaskhas grass comes out of the thermantidote.
G. A. Mackay, Sir Ali Baba, p. 112. (Yule and Burnell.)

thermatology (thėr-ma-tol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] In med., the science of the treatment of disease by heat, and specifically by thermal mineral waters; balneology.

Thermesia (thėr-mē'si-ä), n. [NL. (Hübner, 1816), < Gr. θέρμη, heat: see therm.] A genus of noctuid moths, typical of the family Thermesiidæ, comprising a number of slender geometriform species, mostly from tropical regions.

Thermesiidæ (thėr-mē-sī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Guenée, 1852), < Thermesia + -idæ.] A large family of noctuid moths of the pseudodeltoid group, distinguished mainly by their non-angulate wings. About 40 genera besides Thermesia have been placed in this family, which is represented in all parts of the globe except Europe.

thermetrograph (thėr-met'rō-grâf), n. Same as thermometrograph.

thermic (thėr'mik), a. [= F. thermique, < Gr. θέρμη, heat: see therm[2].] Of or relating to heat; thermal: as, thermic conditions.—Thermic anomaly. See anomaly.—Thermic balance. Same as bolometer.—Thermic fever, sunstroke.

thermically (thėr'mi-kal-i), adv. In relation to or as affected by heat; in a thermic manner. [Rare.]

The cases hitherto reported hardly justify positive statements as to the exact situation of thermically active nerves. Medical News, LII. 567.

thermidt, adv. A Middle English form of theremid.

Thermidor (thėr-mi-dôr'; F. pron. ter-mē-dôr'), n. [< F. thermidor, irreg. < Gr. θέρμη, heat, + δῶρον, gift.] The eleventh month of the French republican calendar (see calendar), beginning, in 1794, on July 19th, and ending August 17th.

Thermidorian (thėr-mi-dō'ri-an), a. and n. [< F. thermidorien; as Thermidor + -i-an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Thermidorians. See II.

II. n. One of the more moderate party in the French revolution, who took part in or sympathized with the overthrow of Robespierre and his adherents on 9th Thermidor (July 27th), 1794.

thermo-aqueous (thėr″mō-ā'kwē-us), a. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + L. aqua, water: see aqueous.] Of or pertaining to heated water, or due to its action.

thermobarograph (thėr-mō-bar'ō-grȧf), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. barograph.] An apparatus combining a thermograph and a barograph in one interdependent instrument.

thermobarometer (thėr″mō-ba-rom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. barometer.] 1. A thermometer which indicates the pressure of the atmosphere by the boiling-point of water, used in the measurement of altitudes.—2. A siphon-barometer having its two wide legs united by a narrow tube, so that it can be used either in its ordinary position as a barometer or in the reversed position as a thermometer, the wide sealed leg of the barometer then serving as the bulb of the thermometer.

thermo-battery (thėr″mō-bat'ėr-i), n. A thermopile.

thermocautery (thėr-mō-kâ'tėr-i), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. cautery.] A form of actual cautery in which the heat is produced by blowing benzin-vapor into heated spongy platinum on the inside of the cauterizing platinum-point.

thermochemical (thėr-mō-kem'i-kal), a. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. chemical.] Of or pertaining to thermochemistry, or the production of heat by chemical changes.

thermochemist (thėr-mō-kem'ist), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. chemist.] One who is versed in thermochemistry.

thermochemistry (thėr-mō-kem'is-tri), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. chemistry.] That branch of chemistry which includes all the various relations existing between chemical action and heat; specifically, that branch of chemistry which treats of the production of heat by chemical changes.

thermochrose, n. Same as thermochrosy.

thermochrosy (thėr-mok'rō-si), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + χρῶσις, coloring, < χρώζειν, touch, impart, tinge, color: see chromatic.] The property possessed by radiant heat of being composed, like light, of rays of different refrangibilities, varying in wave-length and in the extent to which they are transmitted through substances. This property follows from the essential identity of the invisible heat-rays of relatively long wave-lengths and the luminous rays, or light-rays. Sometimes called heat-color. See radiation and spectrum.

thermo-couple (thėr'mō-kup″l), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. couple.] A thermo-electric couple. See thermo-electricity. Philos. Mag., 5th ser., XXIX. 141.

thermo-current (thėr'mō-kur″ent), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. current[1].] The current, as of electricity, set up by heating a compound circuit consisting of two or more different metals.

thermod (thėr'mōd or -mod), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + od[3].] Thermic od; the odic or odyllic force of heat. See od[3]. Von Reichenbach.

thermodynamic (thėr″mō-dī-nam'ik), a. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + δύναμις, power: see dynamic.] Relating to thermodynamics; caused or operated by force due to the application of heat.—Thermodynamic function. See function.

thermodynamical (thėr″mō-dī-nam'i-kal), a. [< thermodynamic + -al.] Of or pertaining to thermodynamics. Philos. Mag., 5th ser., XXVII. 213.

thermodynamically (thėr″mō-dī-nam'i-kal-i), adv. In accordance with the laws of thermodynamics. Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXVIII. 467.

thermodynamicist (thėr″mō-dī-nam'i-sist), n. [< thermodynamic + -ist.] A student of thermodynamics; one versed in thermodynamics.

The mechanical equivalent of heat—the familiar "J" of thermodynamicists. The Academy, Oct. 26, 1889, p. 273.

thermodynamics (thėr″mō-dī-nam'iks), n. [Pl. of thermodynamic (see -ics).] The general doctrine of the relations of heat and work, involving the consideration of temperature, volume, pressure, and the transformations of energy. The consideration of moving forces does not enter into the subject to any considerable extent.

Thermodynamics. In a strict interpretation, this branch of science, sometimes called the Dynamical Theory of Heat, deals with the relations between heat and work, though it is often extended so as to include all transformations of energy. Either term is an infelicitous one, for there is no direct reference to force in the majority of questions dealt with in the subject.

Tait, Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 283.

Laws of thermodynamics. The first law is the proposition that a given amount of heat measured by the product of the absolute temperature, the mass heated, and its specific heat is equivalent to and correlated with a given amount of mechanical work measured by the product of a force (as the mass of a body multiplied by the acceleration of gravity) into a distance through which the point of application is driven back against the force. The second law is the proposition that heat tends to flow from a hotter to a colder body, and will not of itself flow the other way.

The principle of the conservation of energy when applied to heat is commonly called the First Law of Thermodynamics. It may be stated thus: when work is transformed into heat, or heat into work, the quantity of work is mechanically equivalent to the quantity of heat. Admitting heat to be a form of energy, the second law asserts that it is impossible, by the unaided action of natural processes, to transform any part of the heat of a body into mechanical work, except by allowing heat to pass from that body into another at a lower temperature.

thermo-electrically (thėr″mō-ē-lek'tri-kal-i), adv. In accordance with the laws of thermo-electricity. Encyc. Brit., VIII. 94.

thermo-electricity (thėr″mō-ē-lek-tris'i-ti), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. electricity.] The electric current produced in a circuit of two or more dissimilar metals, or in a circuit of one metal different parts of which are in dissimilar physical states, when one of the points of union is heated or cooled relatively to the remainder of the circuit; also, the branch of electrical science which treats of electric currents so produced. If, for example, a bar of bismuth and one of antimony are soldered together and the point of union is heated while their other extremities are connected by a wire, it is found that an electric current passes from bismuth to antimony, and through the wire from antimony to bismuth. Such a pair of metal bars is called a thermo-electric couple or pair, and it is found that the thermo-electromotive force, as it is called, is, for a circuit composed of the same pair of metals, proportional to the difference of temperature between the hot and the cold junction. It is found, further, that it differs for different metals; and the list of the metals, arranged in order according to the direction of the current generated, is called the thermo-electric series (analogous to the electromotive series in voltaic electricity): for example, bismuth, lead, zinc, copper, iron, antimony. If more than one couple are employed, the whole electromotive force is the sum of the separate forces for the successive junctions. A number of couples of the same two metals joined together form a thermo-electric battery, or thermopile; they are arranged so that one set of junctions can be heated while the other is kept cool. When connected with a delicate galvanometer, the thermopile can be used to detect and measure very small differences in temperature, as especially small differences in radiant heat; for this purpose one end of the thermopile is generally coated with lampblack so as to absorb the heat incident upon it, and a cone of polished brass may be added to collect more heat. Thermo-electric couples give a comparatively low electromotive force, which has, however, great constancy if the two sets of junctions are kept at a uniform temperature. What is called the Peltier phenomenon or effect is the rise or fall of temperature at the junction of two different metals due to the passage of an electric current from one metal to the other across the junction. This thermal effect is distinct from the rise of temperature due to the electrical resistance of the metals, and changes sign when the direction of the current across the junction is changed.

Thermo-electric Couple.

thermo-electrometer (thėr″mō-ē-lek-trom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. electrometer.] An instrument for ascertaining the heating power of an electric current, or for determining the strength of a current by the heat it produces.

thermo-electromotive (thėr″mō-ē-lek-trō-mō'tiv), a. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. electromotive.] Pertaining to thermo-electricity.—Thermo-electromotive force. Same as thermo-electric force (which see, under thermo-electric).

thermo-element (thėr″mō-el'ē-ment), n. A thermo-electric couple. See thermo-electricity.

thermo-excitory (thėr″mō-ek-sī'tō-ri), a. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. excite + -ory.] Causing the production of heat in the body.

thermogen† (thėr'mō-jen), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + -γενης, producing: see -gen.] The fluid formerly supposed to exist which was known as caloric (which see).

thermogenesis (thėr-mō-jen'e-sis), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + γένεσις, production.] The production of heat; specifically, the production of heat in the human body by physiological processes.

thermogenetic (thėr″mō-jē-net'ik), a. Same as thermogenic. Boston Med. and Surg. Jour.

thermogenic (thėr-mō-jen'ik), a. [As thermogen + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the production of heat; producing heat.—Thermogenic centers, nervous centers whose function is to stimulate the production of heat in the body.—Thermogenic fibers, nervous fibers conveying impulses which increase the production of heat in the body.—Thermogenic substance, a substance which is associated with the production of heat in the body.

thermogenous (thėr-moj'e-nus) a. [As thermogen + -ous.] Producing heat.

thermogram (thėr'mō-gram), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + γράμμα, a mark, writing.] The record made by a thermograph.

★ thermograph (thėr'mō-grȧf), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + γράφειν, write.] An automatic self-registering thermometer. A variety of forms have been used, involving different principles and methods. (a) In the photographic method mercurial thermometers are used in the following manner: near the top of the mercury in the stem an air-bubble separates the column; by the action of a system of lenses the light from a lamp passes through the air-bubble, and throws the image of the bubble on the surface of a revolving cylinder upon which is wrapped a sheet of sensitized paper; no other light except the ray passing through the bubble enters the dark chamber containing the cylinder, and a photographic registration is therefore made of the oscillations of the mercury-column. (b) In the metallic thermograph the actuating instrument is a metallic thermometer whose indications are made to yield any desired degree of sensitiveness by a lever or levers which give motion to a recording pen. To an iron frame (see the cut) are fastened the thermometer-strips, the clock, the adjustments of the recording lever, and the perforated protecting case. The clock rotates a metallic disk once a week. A paper chart is fastened to the disk and rotates with it. The chart is divided into fourteen equal spaces, the dark spaces indicating night-time. These spaces are subdivided to indicate hours. The recording lever traces with an ink pen a line upon the paper chart, according as the metallic thermometer bends as affected by the heat or cold. The thermometer is composed of two strips of metal of different expansibilities. The curve thus traced over the concentric lines of the paper chart which indicate degrees enables the temperature at any time during the week and the rate of variation to be accurately determined. (c) In the electric-contact method a mercurial thermometer having a large bulb and an enlarged stem has the upper end of the tube left open, and a fine platinum wire is made to descend in the tube by clockwork at regular intervals. When the wire comes in contact with the top of the mercury, an electric circuit is closed, and the distance is registered which the platinum wire has descended in order to touch the mercury surface. This method is used in the instruments of Hough and Secchi. (d) In the manometer thermograph the actuating instrument is an air- or gas-thermometer. The vessel containing air is connected by a fine tube with a registering apparatus, of which various forms have been devised. Changes of temperature produce changes of pressure in the inclosed gas, and these changes of pressure are the subject of measurement and registration. The scale of the thermogram is evaluated in degrees either by a theoretical formula or by actual comparisons. The instruments of Schreiber and Sprung belong to this class. (e) A still further form, not belonging strictly to any of the preceding classes, is illustrated by the Richard thermograph. Its thermometer is a Bourdon tube filled with alcohol, to which is attached a lever carrying the registering pen. With a rise of temperature the differential expansion produces a change of shape of the tube, accompanied by a corresponding change in position of the lever and registering pen. A high degree of sensitiveness and consequent accuracy is attained by this instrument.

A, clock-arbor; C, clock-box; D, ink pen; F, F, arcs; L, recording lever; N, N, metallic thermometer-strips; P, P, platinum wires; R, piece for holding thermometer-strips to frame; S, S, screws for adjusting recording lever; W, winding arbors of clock; X, X, screw-holes for fastening instrument in place or in packing-box.

thermography (thėr-mog′ra-fi), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] Any method of writing which requires heat to develop the characters.

thermo-inhibitory (thėr″mō-in-hib′i-tō-ri), a. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. inhibitory.] Noting nerves whose function is to stop or inhibit the production of heat in the body.

thermojunction (thėr′mō-jungk″shon), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. junction.] The point of union of the two metals of a thermo-electric couple.

thermokinematics (thėr-mō-kin-ē-mat′iks), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. kinematics.] The theory of the motion of heat. See the quotation.

thermometer (thėr-mom′e-tėr), n. [= F. thermomètre = Sp. termómetre, termómetro = Pg. thermometro = It. termometro = D. G. Dan. thermometer = Sw. termometer, < NL. thermometrum*, < Gr. θέρμη, heat, + μέτρον, measure.] 1. An instrument by which the temperatures (see temperature and thermometry) of bodies are ascertained, founded on the common property belonging to all bodies, with very few exceptions, of expanding with heat, the rate or quantity of expansion being supposed to be proportional to the degree of heat applied, and hence indicating that degree. The expanding substance may be a liquid, as mercury or alcohol; a gas, as in the air-thermometer (which see); or a solid, as in the metallic thermometer (see below). The ordinary thermometer consists of a slender glass tube with a small bore, containing in general mercury or alcohol; this expands or contracts by variations in the temperature of the atmosphere, or on the instrument being brought into contact with any other body, or being immersed in a liquid or gas which is to be examined, and the state of the atmosphere, the body, liquid, or gas, with regard to heat, is indicated by a scale either applied to the tube or engraved on its exterior surface. The thermometer was invented by Galileo at some date prior to 1611, and was developed by his pupils through the first thirty years of the seventeenth century. In 1641 the Florentine philosophers were using a thermometer consisting of a bulb filled with alcohol, with sealed stem, and graduated on the stem according to an arbitrary scale, of which the divisions were, approximately, fiftieths of the volume of the bulb. Sagredo adopted a scale of 360 divisions, like the graduation of a circle, and fixed the application of the word degree to the thermometric spaces. No means of comparing observations made with thermometers containing different fluids and of different manufacture were possible until Fahrenheit adopted a graduation between two fixed temperatures. For the zero of his scale Fahrenheit adopted the lowest temperature observed by him in the winter of 1709, and for his upper fixed point he took the temperature of the body, and marked it 96°. By this system of numeration the temperature of melting ice became 32°, and the boiling-point of water 212°. This is the scale of the Fahrenheit thermometer commonly used by English-speaking peoples and in Holland. De l'Isle, about 1730, first used the melting-point of ice and the boiling-point of water as the fixed points of the thermometric scale, and they gradually came to be universally accepted. In Réaumur's thermometer (formerly largely used in Germany and Russia, but now being superseded) the space between the freezing-point and the boiling-point of water is divided into 80 equal parts, the zero being at freezing. In the centigrade thermometer, used widely throughout Europe, and very extensively in scientific investigations everywhere, the space between the freezing-point and the boiling-point of water is divided into 100 equal parts or degrees, the freezing-point being zero and the boiling-point 100°. The absolute zero of temperature is the logical beginning of a thermometric scale, but since thermometric temperatures are primarily relative, the zero-point is arbitrary, and the Fahrenheit, Réaumur, and centigrade thermometers present the different systems of numeration that have come into use. The following formulæ give the conversion of these scales: Let F, R, and C represent any temperature as given by the three scales respectively, then $F = R \times \frac{9}{4} + 32° = C \times \frac{9}{5} + 32°$. The standard mercurial thermometer consists of a slender tube with capillary bore hermetically sealed at the top, and terminating at its lower end in a bulb filled with mercury. The melting-point of ice and the boiling-point of water at standard pressure are determined on the tube, and the intermediate space is subdivided into equal parts. The graduations are extended above and below the fiducial points, and finally the tube is calibrated, and outstanding errors of the graduation are determined. Ordinary thermometers covering any desired small range of temperature are graduated by comparison with a standard. For extreme degrees of cold, thermometers filled with spirit of wine must be employed, as no degree of cold known is capable of freezing that liquid, whereas mercury freezes at about 39° below zero on the Fahrenheit scale. On the other hand, spirit of wine is not adapted to high temperatures, as it is soon converted into vapor, whereas mercury does not boil till its temperature is raised to 660° F. Mercury thermometers designed for measuring temperatures up to 400° C. (752° F.) are made by filling the stem and an upper bulb above the stem with nitrogen. The mercury expands against the increasing pressure of the nitrogen, and its boiling-point is raised thereby. Temperatures higher than this limit are usually obtained with air- or steam-thermometers and other forms of pyrometer (which see). The air- (or gas-)thermometer consists of a quantity of pure dry air or gas contained in a reservoir such that its change of volume or of pressure with varying temperatures may be properly observed. Two forms have been used—(1) the constant-pressure thermometer, in which the gas is maintained at constant pressure and its varying volume measured; (2) the constant-volume thermometer, in which the increase of pressure under constant volume is measured. This is the ordinary form in which the instrument is used. For accuracy it is decidedly superior to the mercury thermometer, and has been adopted as the ultimate standard to which all other thermometers are referred. In the metallic thermometer, as generally constructed, temperature is measured by the change in form of composite metal bars, due to their differential expansion (hence more properly called bimetallic thermometer). One of the early forms was that of Bréguet, which consists of a fine spiral bar made of platinum, gold, and silver. One end of the spiral is fixed, the other end being connected with a simple mechanical device to convert the curving or torsion of the bar under changes of temperature into the movement of an index over a dial having a scale marked in a circle upon it. The same principle, with variations in the mechanical application, is now much used in the construction of thermographs. For indicating very slight variations of temperature a thermo-electric junction or the bolometer is employed.

Aspiration thermometer, one in which the temperature of the air is obtained by drawing air in with a ventilating-fan through a tube, and causing it to flow rapidly over a thermometer, or over wet- and dry-bulb thermometers, placed therein. This method, first described by Belli in 1837, has been followed and developed in the instrument of Assmann.—Attached thermometer, one fastened to the tube of a barometer for indicating the temperature of its mercury.—Axilla thermometer. See axilla.—Bi-metal thermometer, a thermometer composed of a bar of two metals or alloys, having different rates of expansion, brazed together and sometimes bent into the form of a spiral. The compound bar is fastened rigidly at one end, the other end being connected with a simple mechanical device to convert the curving or torsion of the bar under changes of temperature into the movement of an index over a dial having a scale marked upon it.—Celsius thermometer, a thermometer introduced by Celsius in 1736 (and used to a limited extent), in which the zero of the scale was placed at the temperature of boiling water and 100° at the temperature of melting ice, plus (+) and minus (—) degrees in atmospheric temperatures being thus avoided. This was a centigrade scale, but not that of the modern centigrade thermometer, which was introduced by Linnæus.—Centigrade thermometer. See def. 1.—Chromatic thermometer, an arrangement of glass plates, devised by Sir David Brewster, exhibiting the difference between their temperature and that of an object with which they are brought in contact by the different hues of the polarized light produced in the plates.—Chromo thermometer, an instrument used to raise the temperature of petroleum at the rate of 20° in fifteen minutes: used for purposes of testing.—Clinical thermometer, a small maximum self-registering mercurial thermometer used in obtaining the temperature of the body. In its usual form the range of scale is 25° F., or less, and graduation is carried to one fifth of a degree. A very sensitive clinical instrument, called the half-minute thermometer, has a bulb of small diameter and an extremely fine bore, in which the mercury is rendered visible by a lens-fronted stem.—Conjugate thermometer. Same as differential thermometer.—Deep-sea thermometer, a registering thermometer used to ascertain the temperature of the sea at any depth. The instrument consists of the thermometer proper set in a metallic frame. The form of thermometer now used is that of Negretti and Zambra. It consists of a mercury thermometer whose stem, of wide bore, terminates in a small pyriform sac. The stem is contracted and contorted just above the bulb, and when the instrument is inverted, the mercury-column breaks at this point, and flows down into the tube, which is graduated in the inverted position. An overflow-cell prevents mercury from the bulb from entering the stem if there is a rise of temperature. To protect it from pressure, the thermometer is hermetically sealed in a strong glass tube, the part of which surrounding the bulb contains a quantity of mercury secured by a ring of india-rubber cement. By means of mechanism in its frame, the thermometer is made to turn over at any desired depth, and the temperature at the instant of inversion remains recorded in the tube until the instrument is read and reset. For small depths, the instrument is reversed by a weight which is sent down the sounding-line. For great depths, the reversal is effected by means of the revolution of a small propeller, which is set in motion by the water so soon as the thermometer is drawn upward.—Deville's air-thermometer, a form of air-thermometer used for measuring very high temperatures—the thermometric substance, the air, being contained in a porcelain bulb capable of resisting the heat of a furnace.—Differential thermometer, an instrument for measuring very small differences of temperature. The earliest form, invented and named by Sir John Leslie, consists of a U-shaped tube, each end of which terminates in a bulb. The bend of the tube contains a colored liquid; the upper parts of the tube and the bulbs are filled with confined air. When one of the bulbs is at a higher temperature than the other, the liquid in the adjacent stem is driven down by the higher pressure, and rises in the opposite branch. The difference in height is proportional to the difference in temperature of the two bulbs. The instrument is now used only as a thermoscope.—Earth-thermometer, one designed for ascertaining the temperature of the ground at different depths. Three types have been employed—(a) a thermometer of large bulb and very long stem, so that, although buried many feet in the ground, the top of the liquid column extends above the surface (temperatures at depths of twenty feet have been obtained by this); (b) an ordinary thermometer inclosed in a wooden tube and other non-conducting packings, which can be sunk to any desired depth, the temperature of the thermometer being assumed not to change during the short time required to draw it up and make the reading; (c) (1) thermo-electric junctions; (2) the electrical-resistance method.—Electric thermometer. (a) An apparatus for measuring small differences of temperature, based on the action of a thermopile. See thermo-electricity. (b) A thermometer whose action is based on the variation of electrical resistance produced by changes of temperature in a metallic conductor. The difference in the resistance between a current passing through a conductor of known and one of unknown temperature gives the difference of temperature between the two. Also called differential-resistance thermometer. The most delicate form in which the principle is applied is the bolometer.—Fahrenheit thermometer. See def. 1.—Kinnersley's thermometer, an apparatus sometimes used to illustrate the sudden expansion of air through which a discharge of high-potential electricity has taken place. It consists of two connected tubes partially filled with water; the larger one contains above the water-surface two knobs, and when the spark is formed between them the water is forced up to a higher level in the smaller tube.—Maximum thermometer, one that registers the maximum temperature to which it is exposed. Three types have come into use in connection with the mercurial thermometer. (a) The Rutherford maximum has a light movable steel index at the top of the mercurial column. The tube is placed horizontal, and as the temperature rises the mercury pushes the index before it. When the temperature falls, the index is left in situ to mark the position of the maximum. (b) In Phillips's maximum, a small bubble of air makes a break in the upper part of the mercurial column. When the temperature begins to fall, the detached portion of the column is left behind to register the highest temperature. (c) The Negretti maximum has the bore of the tube partly closed by a constriction just above the bulb. In rising temperatures mercury is forced from the bulb past the constriction, but when the temperature falls the mercury cannot readily return to the bulb, and the top of the mercurial column indicates the maximum temperature. In order to reset the thermometer to the current air-temperature, the mercury is forced back into the bulb by whirling the instrument on a swing-pin. This form of maximum is used at the stations of the United States Weather Bureau.—Mercury thermometer. See def. 1.—Metallic thermometer. See def. 1.—Metastatic thermometer, a very sensitive mercurial thermometer, having an apical cavity into which any desired part of the mercury can be drawn off. This device enables the thermometer to be used over a wide range of temperature, and the scale to be graduated to small fractions of a degree, without increasing the length of the stem. For each different state of the instrument, the temperature corresponding to some part of the scale must be determined by comparison with a standard thermometer.—Methyl-butyrate thermometer, one in which the thermometric substance is methyl butyrate. Sir William Thomson, Encyc. Brit., XI. 569.—Minimum thermometer, a thermometer that registers the minimum temperature to which it is exposed. The alcohol minimum, devised by Rutherford in 1794, is now universally used. The registration is effected by a light steel or glass index enlarged and rounded at the end, and wholly immersed in the column of alcohol. When the temperature falls, the index is carried toward the bulb by the surface-tension at the end of the contracting liquid column, and when the temperature rises the alcohol flows around and past the index, leaving it to mark the lowest temperature.—Optical thermometer, a thermometer proposed by Cornu for the study of high temperatures, based on the principle that in certain crystals the amount of the rotation of the plane of polarization depends on the temperature. As quartz can be submitted to a wide range of temperature, it is considered to be specially adapted for the application of this method in determining high temperatures.—Overflowing or mercurial-weight thermometer, a mercury-thermometer consisting of a bulb with a short piece of fine stem perfectly filled with mercury at 0° C. Any higher temperature is determined by weighing the quantity of mercury expelled, instead of by measuring it volumetrically, as in the ordinary mercurial stem-thermometer.—Radiation thermometer. See terrestrial-radiation thermometer and solar-radiation thermometer.—Réaumur thermometer. See def. 1.—Registering thermometer, a self-registering thermometer; a maximum or minimum thermometer.—Six's thermometer, a self-registering thermometer, invented by J. Six in 1781, combining in one instrument the registration of maximum and minimum temperatures: for many years very widely used, but now generally superseded by separate maximum and minimum instruments.—Sling-thermometer, a thermometer with which the temperature of the air is obtained by whirling the instrument in the free air. The resulting rapid convection brings the temperature of the thermometer into close accordance with the temperature of the air.—Solar-radiation thermometer, a thermometer for measuring the intensity of solar radiation. A form frequently adopted for this purpose is the black-bulb thermometer in vacuo, first suggested by Sir John Herschel. It consists of a sensitive mercurial thermometer having the bulb and about an inch of the stem covered with lampblack. The whole is inclosed in a glass tube, of which one end is blown into a large bulb in the center of which is fixed the bulb of the thermometer, and the tube is then exhausted of air. The thermometer-bulb thus prepared absorbs all the solar heat that falls upon it, and loses none by convection. With the black-bulb thermometer there is frequently used a bright-bulb thermometer similarly incased. This has its bulb covered with polished silver, or some equivalent coating, which reflects most of the radiation that falls upon it. The difference between the readings of these two instruments is assumed to measure the intensity of solar radiation.—Submarine thermometer. Same as deep-sea thermometer.—Terrestrial-radiation thermometer, a minimum thermometer used to register the cooling of the earth's surface below the temperature of the air by nocturnal radiation. The bulb of the thermometer is generally shaped with special regard to obtaining a high degree of sensitiveness. Also called nocturnal-radiation thermometer.—Upsetting thermometer, a form of mercurial thermometer devised by Negretti and Zambra for registering the temperature at any desired time. The registration is effected by inverting the instrument, after which it remains unaltered until it is reset. By means of clockwork, the upset may be made to occur automatically at any desired time, and a series of such thermometers constitutes a method for obtaining hourly temperatures. The instrument finds its principal use as a deep-sea thermometer. See above.—Water-steam thermometer, a proposed form of thermometer in which the thermometric substance is saturated water-vapor, and in which the temperature is given from the pressure of the vapor as measured by the height of the water-column it can support.—Wet-bulb thermometer. See psychrometer.

thermometric (thėr-mō-met′rik), a. [= F. thermométrique; as thermometer + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to a thermometer: as, the thermometric scale or tube.—2. Made by means of a thermometer: as, thermometric observations.—Thermometric steam-gage, a form of steam-gage which shows the amount of pressure in a boiler by the degree of expansion of a fluid at the temperature produced by the pressure. E. H. Knight.

thermometrical (thėr-mō-met′ri-kal), a. [< thermometric + -al.] Same as thermometric. Boyle, Works, II. 466.

thermometrically (thėr-mō-met′ri-kal-i), adv. In a thermometrical manner; by means of a thermometer.

thermometrograph (thėr-mō-met′rō-gràf), n. [= F. thermométrographe, < Gr. θέρμη, heat, + μέτρον, measure, + γράφειν, write.] A self-registering thermometer, especially one which registers the maximum or minimum temperature during long periods. Also thermetrograph.

thermometry (thėr-mom′e-tri), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + -μετρία, < μέτρον, measure.] The art of measuring temperature. A numerical unit of temperature difference is derived from the measurable physical effects produced in bodies by heat—for example, linear expansion, volumetric expansion, change of gaseous elastic pressure, and change in electric resistance. In the customary use of the thermometer, changes in temperature are assumed to be directly proportional to the observed changes in the thermometric material, and temperature units are defined in terms of the particular material and phenomenon adopted. The thermometric unit which has been adopted by the International Bureau of Weights and Measures is one centigrade degree, or the hundredth part of the fractional increase of pressure of a volume of pure dry gas originally at a pressure of one standard atmosphere, and heated from the standard freezing-point to the standard boiling-point of water. With this unit, increments of temperature are closely proportional to increments of heat, and the air- (or gas-)thermometer of constant volume is the adopted instrumental standard. The air-thermometer, however, is not adapted to ordinary uses, and it is the object of thermometry to obtain comparable temperatures with convenient and portable instruments. The expansion of liquids is closely proportional to successive increments of heat, and is taken as the basis of the usual secondary thermometric standards. It should be observed, however, that in general the subject of measurement is not the simple expansion of the liquid, but the differential expansion of the liquid and the glass bulb in which it is contained; and from the standpoint of precise thermometry it is in this uncertain, irregular, and varying behavior of the glass that the principal residual discrepancies of normal mercurial thermometers lie. The most important of these sources of error in mercurial thermometers is a change in the zero-point with time and with the temperatures to which the thermometers are exposed. This change depends upon the nature of the glass. Glass of special composition is now used in the construction of thermometers, which will practically eliminate this source of error. The method of graduating thermometers between two fiducial points, instead of by volume, was an advance in construction adopted by Fahrenheit that first made possible the construction of comparable thermometers. The adoption later of the freezing-point and the boiling-point of water for these two standard temperatures brought different kinds of thermometers into substantial agreement. In the recent progress of precise thermometry, residual sources of error have been discovered, and outstanding discrepancies have been investigated, so as to render possible the reduction of all observed temperatures to the thermodynamic scale.

thermomotive (thėr-mō-mō′tiv), a. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. motive.] Broadly, pertaining to or derived from molar motion produced by heat, as in any heat-engine, but more particularly used with reference to heat-engines in which motion is derived from air or other gas expanded by heat: as, thermomotive power; thermomotive effect; thermomotive efficiency.

thermomotor (thėr-mō-mō′tor), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + LL. motor, a mover.] A heat-engine, particularly a so-called caloric engine, or an air-engine driven by the expansive force of heated air. Compare gas-engine, heat-engine, and caloric engine (under caloric).

thermomultiplier (thėr-mō-mul′ti-plī-ėr), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. multiplier.] Same as thermopile. See the quotation.

> The discoveries of Oersted and Seebeck led to the construction of an instrument for measuring temperature incomparably more delicate than any previously known. To distinguish it from the ordinary thermometer, this instrument is called the thermomultiplier.

> W. R. Grove, Corr. of Physical Forces, iii.

thermonatrite (thėr-mō-nā′trīt), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. natron + *-ite*2.] Hydrous sodium carbonate ($Na_2CO_3 + H_2O$), occurring chiefly as an efflorescence in connection with saline lakes.

thermo-pair (thėr′mō-pār), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. *pair*1.] A thermo-electric element or couple. See thermo-electricity.

thermopalpation (thėr″mō-pal-pā′shọn), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + L. palpatio(n-), a stroking: see palpation.] Palpation of the surface of the body to determine temperature, especially to determine topographical differences of temperature with a view to determine the position and condition of internal organs.

thermophone (thėr′mō-fōn), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + φωνή, a sound.] An electrical instrument in which sounds are produced by the changes in the circuit due to variations of temperature.

thermopile (thėr′mō-pīl), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. *pile*2.] A thermo-electric battery, especially as arranged for the measurement of small quantities of radiant heat. See thermo-electricity.

thermoregulator (thėr-mō-reg′ū-lā-tor), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. regulator.] A device for regulating the temperature of a heating-apparatus.

thermoscope (thėr′mō-skōp), n. [= F. thermoscope = Sp. It. termoscopio, < Gr. θέρμη, heat, + σκοπεῖν, view, examine.] An instrument or a device for indicating variations in temperature without measuring their amount. The name was first applied by Count Rumford to an instrument invented by him, resembling the differential thermometer of Leslie. Out of an indefinite number of thermoscopes, a class of chromatic thermoscopes may be mentioned in which changes in temperature are indicated by changes in the shade or the color of a substance coated with certain chemical preparations. These have been used to some extent for indicating a rise in temperature caused by the heating of a journal in machinery. Thermoscopes consisting of a tube containing air or mercury, and having an adjustable scale, or a scale limited to a few degrees, are used in machines for testing lubricants, in appliances for physical research, as in Osborne's esthermoscope, and in diagnosis, as in Dr. Seguin's thermoscope for detecting minute variations in the temperature of the body.

thermoscopic (thėr-mō-skop′ik), a. [< thermoscope + -ic.] Pertaining to the thermoscope; made by means of the thermoscope: as, thermoscopic observations. Grove.

thermoscopical (thėr-mō-skop′i-kal), a. [< thermoscopic + -al.] Same as thermoscopic.

thermosiphon (thėr-mō-sī′fọn), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + σίφων, siphon.] An arrangement of siphon-tubes serving to induce circulation of water in a heating apparatus.

thermostat (thėr′mō-stat), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + στατός, verbal adj. of ἱστάναι, stand: see static.] An automatic apparatus for indicating or regulating temperature. It is essentially a modification of the thermometer, so arranged that, in place of indicating thermal variations, it controls the source of heat or of ventilation, and thus indirectly regulates the temperature. One of the earliest forms of thermostat was that devised by Dr. Ure. It consisted of a bar composed of two metals, say steel and copper, having different degrees of expansion under the same temperature. This bar, when fixed in position, was made by simple mechanical means to open a furnace-door, move a damper, or open a window, by means of the bending of the bar under the influence of an increase in heat. Other forms of this thermostat have since been used to make or break a, base; b, involute expansion-strip, composed of two metals having different coefficients of expansion, as brass and steel; c, adjustment-screw, forming part of an electric circuit whenever b is expanded by heat so as to touch the point of the screw; d, d, conducting wires.

an electric current, and thus move an armature that controls a damper, steam-valve, or other heat-regulating mechanism. Another form consists of a balanced thermometer that, under the movements of the mercury in a tube pivoted in the center in a horizontal position, would rise or fall, and thus control a damper or fire-door. Another form consists of a thermometer resembling a thermo-electric alarm (see thermo-electric), except that the closing of the circuit by the rise of the mercury in the tube operates a fire-door or damper in place of sounding an alarm. Where a thermostat is merely used to ring a bell, it is called a thermostatic alarm. A very simple and yet delicately responsive form is a slender bar of gutta-percha, fixed at one end, and attached at the other to a lever, which is caused to act by the expansion or contraction of the bar. Another form of thermostat consists of a bent tube partly filled with mercury. The heat expands the air in the larger end of the tube and displaces the mercury, and this in turn moves a piston controlling, by means of some mechanical device, a steam-valve or damper. Another form, used with steam-heating furnaces, consists of an elastic diaphragm in a cylinder, the pressure of the steam against the diaphragm serving to move a piston that controls the damper of the furnace. Such appliances are also called heat-regulators. More recently, the name has been given to fusible plugs used to control automatic sprinklers, a rise in the temperature causing the plug to melt and release the water. This, however, is only a trade use of the word.

thermostatic (thėr-mō-stat′ik), a. [< thermostat + -ic.] Pertaining to the thermostat; characterized by the presence of a thermostat; involving the principle of the thermostat.

thermostatically (thėr-mō-stat′i-kal-i), adv. By means of a thermostat: as, a thermostatically adjusted radiator.

thermostatics (thėr-mō-stat′iks), n. [Pl. of thermostatic (see -ics).] The theory of the equilibrium of heat. See the quotation under thermokinematics.

thermotaxic (thėr-mō-tak′sik), a. [Prop. thermotactic;* < thermotaxis (-tact-) + -ic.] In physiol., pertaining to regulation of the temperature of the body, or the adjustment of thermogenesis and thermolysis so as to produce a certain temperature.

thermotaxis (thėr-mō-tak′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. θέρμη, heat, + τάξις, order, arrangement.] The regulation of the bodily temperature, or the adjustment of thermogenesis and thermolysis so as to secure a certain temperature.

thermotelephone (thėr-mō-tel′ē-fōn), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. telephone.] 1. A telephone receiver in which the changes of length, due to change of temperature, of a fine wire through which the currents are made to pass actuate the phonic diaphragm.—2. A telephone transmitter in which a red-hot wire forming part of the primary circuit of an induction-coil has its resistance changed by the sound-vibrations, thus inducing currents in the secondary which are sent to line.

thermotensile (thėr-mō-ten'sil), a. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + E. tensile.] Relating to tensile force as affected by changes of temperature. Elaborate thermotensile experiments on iron and steel, especially with reference to boiler-iron, have been made, and their results tabulated, this being a matter of great practical importance.

thermotic (thėr-mot'ik), a. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + -otic.] Of or relating to heat; resulting from or dependent on heat.

In the spectrum of a flint-glass prism the apex of the thermotic curve—that is to say, the place of greatest heat-effect—is situated . . . outside the apparent spectrum in the ultra-red region. Lommel, Light (trans.), p. 201.

thermotical (thėr-mot'i-kal), a. [< thermotic + -al.] Same as thermotic. Whewell, Hist. Induct. Sciences, x. 1, § 4.

thermotics (thėr-mot'iks), n. [Pl. of thermotic (see -ics).] The science of heat.

In the History of the Sciences, I have named it [the Science of Heat] Thermotics, which appears to me to agree better with the analogy of the names of other corresponding sciences, Acoustics and Optics.
Whewell, Philos. Induct. Sciences, I. lxxii.

★ thermotropic (thėr-mō-trop'ik), a. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + τροπικός, < τρέπειν, turn: see tropic.] In biol., exhibiting or characterized by thermotropism.

Curvatures dependent upon temperature are called thermotropic.
Goodale, Physiol. Bot., p. 394.

★ thermotropism (thėr-mot'rō-pizm), n. [< thermotrop-ic + -ism.] In biol., motion or growth in relation to a source of heat. Plant organs which curve toward the source of heat are called positively thermotropic, and those which curve away from the source of heat, negatively thermotropic.

thermotype (thėr'mō-tīp), n. [< Gr. θέρμη, heat, + τύπος, impression: see type.] A picture-impression, as of a slice of wood, obtained by first wetting the object with dilute acid, as sulphuric or hydrochloric, then printing it, and afterward developing the impression by heat.

thermotypy (thėr'mō-tī-pi), n. [As thermotype + -y[3].] The act or process of producing a thermotype.

therne†, n. [ME., also tarne, < Icel. therna = Sw. tärna = Dan. terne = OHG. thiarna, diorna, MHG. dierne, dirne, G. dirne, a girl.] A girl; a wench.

As sengle knave and sengle tarne,
Whan they synne togedyr gerne.
MS. Harl. 1701, f. 49. (Halliwell.)

therodont (thē'rō-dont), a. and n. Same as theriodont.

Therodontia (thē-rō-don'shi-ą), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Theriodontia.

theroid (thē'roid), a. [< Gr. θήρ (θηρ-), a wild beast, + εἶδος, form.] Having animal propensities or characteristics.

The animal mind of the theroid idiot is accompanied by appropriate animal peculiarities of body.
Nineteenth Century, Sept., 1886, p. 353.

therologic (thē-rō-loj'ik), a. [< therolog-y + -ic.] Pertaining to therology.

therological (thē-rō-loj'i-kal), a. [< therologic + -al.] Same as therologic.

therologist (thē-rol'ō-jist), n. [< therolog-y + -ist.] A student of the Mammalia; a mammalogist. The Academy, Aug. 25, 1877.

therology (thē-rol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. θήρ (θηρ-), a wild beast, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of mammals; mammalogy or mastology: introduced lately on the ground that mammalogy is a hybrid word.

theromorph (thē'rō-môrf), n. One of the Theromorpha.

Theromorpha (thē-rō-môr'fą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. θήρ (θηρ-), a wild beast, + μορφή, form.] An order of fossil reptiles, of the Permian and Triassic, named from their resemblances to mammals. The quadrate bone is fixed; the ribs are two-headed; the precoracoid is present, and the coracoid is reduced in size, with free extremity; the vertebræ are amphicœlous, and the pubic bones are entirely anterior to the ischia; and there is no obturator foramen. Some of the Theromorpha were made known by Owen under the name Theriodontia. These remains were from Cape Colony, but the Theromorpha have mostly been studied by Cope from remains found in the Permian of Texas. The order is divided by Cope into Anomodontia and Pelycosauria. See these words. Also, rarely, Theromora.

theromorphia (thē-rō-môr'fi-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. θήρ (θηρ-), a wild beast, + μορφή, form.] In human anat., an abnormality in structure resembling the norm in lower animals.

theromorphic[1] (thē-rō-môr'fik), a. [< Theromorpha + -ic.] Theromorphous.

theromorphic[2] (thē-rō-môr'fik), a. [< theromorphia + -ic.] Abnormally resembling in anatomical structure the lower animals.

theromorphous (thē-rō-môr'fus), a. [< Theromorpha + -ous.] Pertaining to the Theromorpha, or having their characters.

theropod (thē'rō-pod), a. and n. [< Gr. θήρ (θηρ-), a wild beast, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] I. a. Having feet like those of (mammalian) beasts, as a dinosaur; of or pertaining to the Theropoda.

II. n. A carnivorous dinosaur of the order Theropoda.

Also theriopod, and (erroneously) therapod.

Theropoda (thē-rop'ō-dą), n. pl. [NL.: see theropod.] A suborder of extinct carnivorous dinosaurs, having digitigrade hind feet with prehensile claws, very short fore limbs, hollow limb-bones, cavernous vertebræ, premaxillary teeth, and united pubes. They were of large or gigantic size and predaceous habits, and in the structure of the feet resembled quadrupeds rather than birds (see Ornithopoda), whence the name. There are several families, as Megalosauridæ, Cœluridæ, and Compsognathidæ. Also, incorrectly, Therapoda.

theropodous (thē-rop'ō-dus), a. Same as theropod. Geol. Jour., XLV. i. 44.

thersitical (thėr-sit'i-kal), a. [< Thersites (L. Thersites, < Gr. Θερσίτης) + -ic-al.] Resembling or characteristic of Thersites, a scurrilous character in Homer's Iliad; hence, grossly abusive; scurrilous; foul-mouthed.

There is a pelting kind of thersitical satire, as black as the ink 'tis wrote with. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, ix. 14.

thesaurer†, n. [< ML. thesaurarius, treasurer, < L. thesaurarius, pertaining to treasure, < thesaurus, treasure: see thesaurus and treasure, and cf. treasurer.] A treasurer.

To my loving frendes Sir Thomas Boleyne Knight, Thesaurer of the Kinges Graces most honorable Houshold, and Sir Henry Guldeford, Knight Comptroller of the same.
Abp. Warham, in Ellis's Hist. Letters, 3d ser., I. 367.

thesaurus (thē-sâ'rus), n. [< L. thesaurus, OL. thensaurus, thensaurum, < Gr. θησαυρός, a store laid up, treasure, a treasure-house, storehouse, chest: see treasure, the old form of the word, derived through OF. and ME.] A treasury; a store; especially, thesaurus verborum, or simply thesaurus, a treasury of words; a lexicon.

In a complete thesaurus of any language, the etymology of every word should exhibit both its philology and its linguistics, its domestic history and its foreign relations.
G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., iii.

these (ŦHēz), a. and pron. Plural of this.

Theseion, Theseum (thē-sē'on, -um), n. [NL., < Gr. Θησεῖον, Θήσειον, < Θησεύς, Theseus.] A temple or sanctuary of the Athenian hero-king Theseus, especially a temple built in Athens, about 460 B. C., to receive the bones of Theseus, then brought home from Scyros; at the present time, specifically, a beautiful hexastyle peripteral Doric temple of Pentelic marble, dating from the second half of the fifth century B. C., still standing in Athens at the foot of the Acropolis and Areopagus. Its interior arrangements and its sculptured decoration have suffered much, but it is notwithstanding the most perfect surviving example of a Greek temple, and exhibits all the refinements of Doric architecture at its culmination. This temple is now identified with practical certainty as that of Hephæstus (Vulcan); it was certainly not the temple of Theseus. See also cut under opisthodomos.

The so-called Theseion, at Athens, from the southwest.

thesicle (thē'si-kl), n. [Dim. of thesis.] A little or subordinate thesis, a proposition. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

Thesieæ (thē-sī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1837), < Thesium + -eæ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous plants, of the Santalaceæ, the sandalwood family. It is characterized by its small nut-like fruit, and perianth-tube prolonged above the inferior ovary and without a conspicuous disk. It includes 5 genera of herbs and low undershrubs, of which Thesium is the type; the others are mainly natives of South America or South Africa.

thesis (thē'sis), n.; pl. theses (-sēz). [= F. thèse = Sp. tesis = Pg. these = It. tesi = G. thesis, these, < L. thesis, < Gr. θέσις, a proposition, a statement, a thing laid down, thesis in rhetoric, thesis in prosody (from the setting down of the foot in beating time); cf. θετός, placed, < τιθέναι (√ θε), put, set: see do[1]. Cf. theme, from the same Gr. verb.] 1. The formulation in advance of a proposition to be proved; a position; a proposition which one advances and offers to maintain by argument against objections.

Antitheta are Theses argued pro et contra [for and against]. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

In all the foreign universities and convents there are upon certain days philosophical theses maintained against every adventitious disputant. Goldsmith, Vicar, xx.

Hence—2. An essay or dissertation upon a specific or definite theme, as an essay presented by a candidate for a diploma or degree, as for that of doctor.

Then comes the struggle for degrees,
With all the oldest and ablest critics;
The public thesis and disputation.
Longfellow, Golden Legend, vi.

3. A theme; a subject propounded for a school or college exercise; the exercise itself.—4. (a) A premise assumed and not proved, although not self-evident; either a postulate or a definition. (b) The consequent of a hypothetical proposition. [Rare.]—5. In musical rhythmics, a heavy accent, such as in beating time is marked by a down-beat. See rhythm.—6. In pros.: (a) Originally, and in more correct recent usage, that part of a foot which receives the ictus, or metrical stress. (b) In prevalent modern usage, the metrically unaccented part of a foot. See arsis, 1.—7. In anc. rhet., a general question, not limited to special persons and circumstances: opposed to a hypothesis, or question which is so limited.—8. In rhet., the part of a sentence preceding and correlated to the antithesis. [Rare.]

The style of Junius is a sort of metre, the law of which is a balance of thesis and antithesis.
Coleridge, Table-Talk, II. 213.

=Syn. 1. Topic, Point, etc. See subject.

Thesium (thē'sī-um), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), L. name of T. Linophyllon, so called, according to Athenæus, because Theseus crowned Ariadne with it; < Gr. Θήσειον, neut. of Θήσειος, belonging to Theseus, < Θησεύς, Theseus.] A genus of plants, type of the tribe Thesieæ in the family Santalaceæ. It is characterized by linear or scale-like leaves, and bisexual flowers with small ovate or oblong anthers and a filiform, often flexuous or zigzag placenta. There are about 115 species, widely distributed through the Old World, chiefly in the temperate parts, and with 2 species in Brazil. They are herbs, often with a hard or shrubby base, and frequently parasitic by the root. The leaves are small and alternate. The scentless flowers are borne in a spike or a simple or compound raceme. T. Linophyllon, a small white-flowered plant of English pastures, is called bastard toadflax.

Thesmophoria (thes-mō-fō'ri-ą), n. pl. [< Gr. θεσμοφόρια (pl.), < θεσμοφόρος, law-giving, < θεσμός, law (< τιθέναι, lay down: see thesis), + -φορος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] An ancient Greek festival with mysteries, celebrated by married women in honor of Demeter (Ceres) as the "mother of beautiful offspring." Though not confined to Attica, it was especially observed at Athens and Eleusis.

In the Thesmophoria, as well as the pigs' flesh mysterious sacred objects were in use, made of the dough of wheat, and in the shape of forms of snakes and men.
Harrison and Verrall, Ancient Athens, p. xxxv.

Thespesia (thes-pē′si-ạ), n. [NL. (Solander, 1807), so called from the beauty of the flowers; < Gr. θεσπέσιος, divinely sounding, hence, ineffable, divine; doubtfully explained as < θεός, god, + εἰπεῖν, 2d pers. pl. impv. ἔσπετε, say, speak.] A genus of plants, of the family Malvaceæ and tribe Hibisceæ. It is characterized by flowers with three to five small bractlets, a club-shaped or but slightly divided style, and a five-celled ovary. There are about 5 species, natives of tropical Asia, the Pacific islands, and Madagascar. They are trees or tall herbs, with entire or angulate leaves, and handsome flowers, commonly yellow. One species, T. populnea, is remarkable for its black-dotted seed-leaves. It is a tree sometimes 50 feet high, planted for shade in India, and known as umbrella-tree and bendy-tree, and in Guiana as seaside mahoe. It bears a dense head of foliage, and large yellow flowers with a purple center, changing before evening to purple throughout, and perishing. Its flowers and fruits yield a dye, its seeds a thick deep-red oil known as Portia-nut oil, and its bast a useful fiber made into sacks and wrappings; its wood is used to make boats and furniture.

Thespesia populnea.

Thespian (thes′pi-ạn), a. and n. [= F. Thespien, < Gr. θέσπιος, of or pertaining to Thespis, < Θέσπις, Thespis (see def.).] I. a. Of or relating to Thespis, a semi-legendary Greek poet of Icaria in Attica, often called the father of tragedy; relating or pertaining to dramatic acting in general; dramatic; tragic: as, the Thespian art, the drama. The great impulse given to the drama by Thespis consisted in the adjunction to the old dithyrambic chorus of Dionysus of a single actor who might appear successively in several rôles. The first public contest of Thespis is assigned to the year 536 B. C.

Said we not it was the highest stretch attained by the Thespian Art? Carlyle, French Rev., II. i. 12.

The race of learned men:

thetical† (thet′i-kạl), a. [< thetic + -al.] Laid down; prescriptive; arbitrary.

This law that prohibited Adam the eating of the fruit was merely thetical or positive, not indispensable and natural. Dr. H. More, Def. of Lit. Cabbala, ii.

Thetis (thē′tis), n. [< L. Thetis, < Gr. Θέτις: see def.] 1. In classical myth., a marine goddess, who became the spouse of the mortal Peleus, despite her efforts to escape him by countless Protean transformations, and was by him the mother of Achilles.—2. The seventeenth planetoid, discovered by Luther at Bilk in 1852.

thetsee (thet′sē), n. Same as theetsee.

theurgic (thē-ėr′jik), a. [= F. théurgique = Sp. teúrgico = Pg. theurgico = It. teurgico, < LL. theurgicus, < Gr. θεουργικός, < θεουργία, theurgy: see theurgy.] Pertaining to theurgy, or the power of performing supernatural things.

The soul of the mystic would have passed into the world of spiritual existences; but he was not yet blessed with theurgic faculties, and patiently awaited for the elect.
I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 294.

Theurgic hymns or songs, songs used in incantation.

theurgical (thē-ėr′ji-kạl), a. [< theurgic + -al.] Same as theurgic.

theurgist (thē′ėr jist), n. [= F. théurgiste; as theurg-y + -ist.] One who believes in theurgy, or practises a pretended magic.

As if there be any irrational demons, as the theurgists affirm. Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 864.

theurgy (thē′ėr-ji), n. [= F. théurgie = Sp. teurgia = Pg. theurgia = It. teurgia, < LL. theurgia, < LGr. θεουργία, a divine work, a miracle, magic, sorcery, < θεουργός, one who does the works of God, a priest, < Gr. θεός, god, + ἐργειν*, work.] The working of some divine or supernatural agency in human affairs; a producing of effects by supernatural means; effects or phenomena brought about among men by spiritual agency. Specifically—(a) Divine agency, or direct divine interference, in human affairs or the government of the world.

Homer, with the vast mechanism of the Trojan war in his hands, and in such hands, and almost compelled to employ an elaborate and varied theurgy, . . . was in a position of advantage without parallel for giving form to the religious traditions of his country. Gladstone.

(b) A system of supernatural knowledge or powers believed by the Egyptian Platonists and others to have been communicated to mankind by the beneficent deities, and to have been handed down from generation to generation traditionally by the priests. (c) The art of invoking deities or spirits, or by their intervention conjuring up visions, interpreting dreams, prophesying, receiving and explaining oracles, etc.; the supposed power of obtaining from the gods, by means of certain observances, words, symbols, etc., a knowledge of the secrets which surpass the powers of reason—a power claimed by the priesthood of most pagan religions.

Porphyry and some others did distinguish these two sorts, so as to condemn indeed the grosser, which they called magick or goety; but allowed the other, which they termed theurgy, as laudable and honourable, and as an art by which they received angels, and had communication with the gods.
Hallywell, Melampronœa (1682), p. 51.

It may appear a subject of surprise and scandal . . . that the Grecian mysteries should have been supported by the magic or theurgy of the modern Platonists.
Gibbon, Decline and Fall, xxiii.

(d) In mod. magic, the pretended production of effects by supernatural agency, as contradistinguished from natural magic.

thevet†, n. [ME.; cf. thevethorn.] Bramble.

gar; especially, one who solicits a gift (as of seed-corn from one's neighbors), not on the footing of a mendicant, but in a temporary strait or as having some claim on the liberality of others. [Scotch.]

thigh (thī), n. [< ME. thigh, thih, thig, thy, thee, the, thegh, theh, theg, theo,* < AS. theóh, theó = OS. thio = OFries. thiach, Fries. tjea = MD. diege, dieghe, die, dye, dije, D. dije, dij = MLG. dech, dee, de = OHG. dioh, dieh, MHG. diech (dich-) = Icel. thjō, thigh; connection with thick and thee[1] uncertain.] 1. That part of the leg which is between the hip and the knee in man, and the corresponding part of the hind limb of other animals; the femoral region, determined by the extent of the thigh-bone or femur; the femur. The fleshy mass of the thigh consists of three groups of muscles: the extensors of the leg, in front; the flexors of the leg, behind; the adductors of the thigh, on the inner side—together with a part of the gluteal muscles, extended on to the thigh from the buttocks. The line of the groin definitely separates the thigh from the belly in front; and the transverse fold of the buttocks (the gluteofemoral crease) similarly limits the thigh behind when the leg is extended. The inner or adductorial muscles are especially well developed in women. The thigh of most mammals and birds is buried in the flesh of what appears to be the trunk; so that the first joint of the hind leg which protrudes from the body is beyond the knee-joint. There are some exceptions to this rule, as the thigh of the camel and elephant. Many reptiles and batrachians have extensive thighs well marked from the trunk, as ordinary lizards, frogs, newts, etc. No thigh is recognized as such in fishes. See cuts under muscle[1] and Plantigrada.

Like the bee, . . .
Our thighs pack'd with wax, our mouths with honey.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 5. 77.

2. In ornith.: (a) The flank, or the feathers overlying this region of the body, corresponding to the thigh proper, which is deeply buried in the common integument of the body. (b) Loosely, the next joint of the leg; the crus; the drumstick: especially said when the feathers of this part are conspicuous in length or in color, as the "flag" of a hawk.—3. In entom., the third joint or segment of any one of the six legs of a true insect, or eight of an arachnidan; the femur, between the trochanter and the tibia or shank. In some insects, as grasshoppers, locusts, crickets, and such saltatorial forms, the thigh is much enlarged, and forms with the tibia a letter A, reaching high above the body: such thighs are technically called incrassate femora. The three pairs of thighs of a six-legged insect are distinguished as anterior, middle, and posterior. See cut under coxa.

4†. The lower and larger part of the stalk of a plant; the stock or trunk.

The vyne hie and of fecunditee

(g) pl. In law, sometimes, the material objects which can be subject to property rights; sometimes, those rights themselves. The distinction which is often made between corporeal and incorporeal things is a consequence of the confusion of these two meanings. Things real comprehend lands, tenements, and hereditaments, including rights and profits issuing out of land; things personal comprehend goods and chattels; and things mixed are such as partake of the characteristics of the two former, as a title-deed. (h) pl. Circumstances.

There ensued a more peaceable and lasting harmony, and consent of things. Bacon, Physical Fables, i., Expl.

Things are in the saddle,
And ride mankind.
Emerson, Ode, inscribed to W. H. Channing.

2. A portion, part, or particular; an item; a particle; a jot, whit, or bit: used in many adverbial expressions, especially after or in composition with no, any, and some. See nothing, anything, something.

The Western people apparently think no more of throwing down a railroad, if they want to go anywhere, than a conservative Easterner does of taking an unaccustomed walk across country. Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 565.

To think one's penny silver. See penny.—To think out. (a) To gain a clear conception or understanding of, by following a line of thought.

Jevons's idea of Identity is very difficult; I can hardly suppose it to be thought out.
B. Bosanquet, Mind, XIII. 360.

(b) To devise; plan; project.

It is at least possible that if an attempt to invade England on carefully thought-out lines were made, the world would be equally surprised by the result.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 156.

(c) To solve by process of thought: as, to think out a chess problem.—To think scorn of†. See scorn.—To think small beer of. See beer[1].=Syn. 6. To judge, suppose, hold, count, account. See conjecture.

II. intrans. 1. To exercise the intellect, as in apprehension, judgment, or inference; exercise the cognitive faculties in any way not involving outward observation, or the passive reception of ideas from other minds. In this sense the verb think is often followed, by on, of, about, etc., with the name of the remote object sought to be understood, recalled, appreciated, or otherwise investigated by the mental process.

Nothinge lefte thei vn-tolde that thei cowde on thenke.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 370.

Thynke ouer thi synnes be-fore donne and of thi freeltes that thou fallis in ilke day.

How we shall carry ourselves in this business is only to be thought upon. Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, i. 1.

Muckle thought the gudewife to hersell,
Yet ne'er a word she spak.
Get up and Bar the Door (Child's Ballads, VIII. 127).

And Peter called to mind the word that Jesus said unto him. . . . And when he thought thereon, he wept.
Mark xiv. 72.

As I observed that this truth—I think, hence I am—was so certain and of such evidence that no ground of doubt, however extravagant, could be alleged by the Sceptics capable of shaking it, I concluded that I might, without scruple, accept it as the first principle of the Philosophy of which I was in search.
Descartes, Discourse on Method (tr. by Veitch), p. 33.

Light
Sordello rose—to think now; hitherto
He had perceived. Browning, Sordello.

Justice she thought of as a thing that might Balk some desire of hers.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 104.

5. To have a (specified) feeling (for); be affected (toward); especially, to have a liking or fondness: followed by of.

Marie Hamilton 's to the kirk gane,
Wi' ribbons in her hair;
The King thought mair o' Marie Hamilton
Than ony that were there.
The Queen's Marie (Child's Ballads, III. 115).

To think good. See good.—To think long. (a) To long; yearn: usually followed by after or for.

Aftir his loue me thenkith long,
For he hath myne ful dere y-bouȝte.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 9.

Have I thought long to see this morning's face,
And doth it give me such a sight as this?
Shak., R. and J., iv. 5. 41.

Ae bit I canno' eat, father, . . .
Till I see my mither and sister dear,
For lang for them I think.
Young Akin (Child's Ballads, I. 185).

(b) To think the time long; become weary or impatient, especially in waiting for something.

But gin ye like to ware the time, then ye
How a' the matter stood shall vively see;
'Twill may be keep us baith frae thinking lang.
Ross, Helenore, p. 69. (Jamieson.)

[Obsolete or provincial in both senses.]

=Syn. 1. To contemplate, reason.

think[1] (thingk), n. [< think[1], v.] A thinking; thought.

He thinks many a long think.
Browning, Ring and Book, VII. 914.

think[2] (thingk), v. i. [< ME. thinken, thenken, also assibilated thinchen, thunchen (pret. thuhte, thuȝte, thouȝte, thauhte), < AS. thyncan = OS. thunkian = OFries. thinka, thinszia, tinsa = OHG. dunchan, MHG. dunken, G. dünken = Icel. thykkja = Sw. tycka = Dan. tykkes = Goth. thugkjan, seem, appear: see think[1], with which think[2] has been more or less confused.] 1. To seem; appear: with indirect object (dative). [Rare except in methinks, methought.]

If it be wykke, a wonder thynketh me,
Whenne every torment and adversite,
That cometh of him, may to me savory thynke.
Chaucer, Troilus, I. 405.

Ye thenke as that ye were in a dreme, and I merveile moche of youre grete wisdome where it is be-come.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 226.

The beggers craft thynkynge to them moost good.
Barclay, Ship of Fools, I. 303.

The watchman said, Me thinketh the running of the foremost is like the running of Ahimaaz. 2 Sam. xviii. 27.

2†. To seem good.

All his [Priam's] sonnes to sle with sleght of your honde;
Thaire riches to robbe, & there rife goodis;
And no lede for to lyue, but that hom selfe [i. e., to the Greeks themselves] thinke.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 4486.

thinkable (thing'ka-bl), a. [< think[1] + -able.] Capable of being thought; cogitable; conceivable.

A general relation becomes thinkable, apart from the many special relations displaying it, only as the faculty of abstraction develops.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 488.

thinker (thing'kėr), n. [< think[1] + -er[1].] One who thinks; especially, one who has cultivated or exercised to an unusual extent the powers of thought.

A Thinker; memor. Cath. Ang., p. 383.

The Democriticks and Epicureans did indeed suppose all humane cogitations to be caused or produced by the incursion of corporeal atoms upon the thinker.
Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 761.

He considered himself a thinker, and was certainly of a thoughtful turn, but, with his own path to discover, had perhaps hardly yet reached the point where an educated man begins to think. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xii.

thinking (thing'king), n. [< ME. thenking, thenching;* verbal n. of think[1], v.] 1. The mental operation performed by one who thinks.

Thinking, in the propriety of the English tongue, signifies that sort of operation of the mind about its ideas wherein the mind is active.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. ix. 1.

2. The faculty of thought; the mind.

Has Page any brains? hath he any eyes? hath he any thinking? Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 2. 31.

3. That which is thought; a thought, idea, belief, opinion, notion, or the like.

I prithee, speak to me as to thy thinkings.
Shak., Othello, iii. 3. 131.

The idea of the perpetuity of the Roman Empire entered deeply into the Christian thinking of the middle ages.
G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 41.

thinkingly (thing'king-li), adv. With thought or reflection; consciously; deliberately.

thinly (thin'li), adv. [< thin[1] + -ly[2].] In a thin manner; with little thickness or depth; sparsely; slightly; not substantially.

At the unexpected sight of him [his brother], Elidure, himself also then but thinly accompanied, runns to him with open Arms. Milton, Hist. Eng., i.

The West is new, vast, and thinly peopled.
D. Webster, Speech, Pittsburg, July, 1833.

The characters are thinly sketched, the situations at once forced and conventional.
Nineteenth Century, XXIV. 536.

★thinner (thin'ėr), n. [< thin[1] + -er[1].] One who or that which thins.

thinness (thin'nes), n. [< ME. thynnesse, < AS. thynnys, < thynne, thin: see thin[1] and -ness.] The state or property of being thin.

Like those toys
Of glassy bubbles, which the gamesome boys
Stretch to so nice a thinness through a quill.
Donne, Progress of the Soul, xii.

thinnify (thin'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. thinnified, ppr. thinnifying. [< thin[1] + -i-fy.] To make thin. [Rare.]

The heart doth in its left side ventricle so thinnify the blood that it thereby obtains the name of spiritual.
Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, iii. 4.

thinnish (thin'ish), a. [< thin[1] + -ish[1].] Somewhat thin.

Thinocoridæ (thin-ō-kor'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Thinocorus + -idæ.] A family of limicoline and somewhat charadriomorphic birds of South America, represented by the genera Thinocorus and Attagis. Their nearest relatives are the sheathbills, with which they have been combined in the family Chionididæ. The palatal structure is peculiar in the broadly rounded vomer, the form and connections of which recall the ægithognathous palate; there are no basipterygoids; the nasals are schizorhinal; superorbital fossæ are present; the carotids are two in number; and the ambiens, femorocaudal, semitendinosus, and their accessories are present. In general outward appearance these birds resemble quails or partridges, and they were formerly considered to be gallinaceous rather than limicoline. They nest on the ground, and lay colored eggs. There are two or three species of each of the genera, of southern parts of the continent, extending into the tropics only in elevated regions. The birds have been singularly called tringoid grouse.

Palate of Thinocorus rumicivorus, one of the Thinocoridæ. (One and a half times natural size.)
px, premaxillary; mxp, maxillopalatine; vo, broad vomer, rounded off in front; m, malar; pl, palatal; pt, pterygoid.

thinocorine (thī-nok'ō-rin), a. Characteristic of or pertaining to the Thinocoridæ. Stand. Nat. Hist., II. 92.

Thinocorus (thī-nok'ō-rus), n. [NL. (Eschscholtz, 1829), also Tinochorus (Lesson, 1830), also Thinochorus (Agassiz, 1846), also Thynochorus, Thinocoris; prop. Thinocorys*, < Gr. θίς (θιν-), the shore, + κόρυς, the crested lark.] The leading genus of Thinocoridæ; the lark-plovers, as T. rumicivorus, the gachita, of the Lark-plover (Thinocorus ingæ).

Argentine Republic, Chili, and other southerly parts of the Neotropical region. This singular bird is common on dry open plains, in flocks. On the ground it resembles a quail, but its flight is more like that of a snipe. It nests on the ground, and lays pale stone-gray eggs heavily marked with light and dark chocolate-brown spots. Other species are described, as T. ingæ, but they are all much alike. The genus is also called Ocypetes (or Oxypetes) and Itys.

thinolite (thin'ō-līt), n. [< Gr. θίς (θιν-), shore, + λίθος, stone.] A pseudomorphous tufa-like deposit of calcium carbonate, crystalline in form. It is found in great quantities on the shores of Pyramid Lake, Nevada, and at other points within the area of the great Quaternary lake called Lake Lahontan. Its original character is as yet uncertain.

thin-skinned (thin'skind), a. 1. Having a thin skin; hence, unduly sensitive; easily offended; irritable.

Ring's vanity was very thin-skinned, his selfishness easily wounded. Thackeray, Philip, iv.

2. Having merely a thin superstratum of good soil: said of land. Halliwell.

thin-skinnedness (thin'skind-nes), n. The state or quality of being thin-skinned; oversensitiveness.

This too great susceptibility, or thinskinnedness, as it has been called, is not confined to us.
L. Cass, France, its King, etc. (ed. 1841), p. 51.

thio-acid (thī-ō-as'id), n. [< Gr. θεῖον, sulphur, + E. acid.] A designation somewhat loosely applied to certain acids derived from others by the substitution of sulphur for oxygen, generally but not always in the hydroxyl group.

thio-arsenic (thī-ō-är'se-nik), a. [< Gr. θεῖον, sulphur, + ἀρσενικόν, arsenic.] Containing sulphur and arsenic: applied only to certain arsenic acids (see below).—Thio-arsenic acid, an arsenic acid in which sulphur may be regarded as substituted for oxygen. There are three of these acids, not known in the free state, but having well-defined salts. Their formulæ are $H_4As_2S_7$, $HAsS_3$, H_3AsS_4.

thio-ether (thī-ō-ē′thėr), n. [< Gr. θεῖον, sulphur, + E. ether.] A compound, analogous to an ether, in which the alkyl radicals are combined with sulphur instead of oxygen; an alkyl sulphid. Thus $(C_2H_5)_2S$ is a thio-ether analogous to $(C_2H_5)_2O$, which is ordinary ether.

thiophene (thī′ō-fēn), n. [< Gr. θεῖον, sulphur, + E. phen(ol).] A compound, C_4H_4S, related to benzene, and forming a large number of derivatives analogous to those of benzene. It may be regarded as benzene in which one of the three acetylene groups CHCH has been replaced by sulphur. It is a ★colorless limpid oil having a faint odor, and boils at 84°C.

thiosulphate (thī-ō-sul′fāt), n. [< Gr. θεῖον, sulphur, + E. sulphate.] A salt of thiosulphuric acid.

thiosulphuric (thī″ō-sul-fū′rik), a. [< Gr. θεῖον, sulphur, + E. sulphuric.] Noting the acid described below.—Thiosulphuric acid, an acid differing from sulphuric acid in that the oxygen of one hydroxyl group is replaced by a sulphur atom. Thus, sulphuric acid has the formula $SO_2.(OH)_2$, while that of thiosulphuric acid is $SO_2.OH.SH$. The acid itself has not been isolated, but it forms a number of stable crystalline salts, formerly called hyposulphites.

thir (ŦHėr), pron. pl. [< ME. thir, < Icel. their, they, theirsi, these: see this, they[1].] These. [Obsolete or dialectal.]

> And sen sekenes es sent to the > Thir men sall noght vnserued be.
> Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 85.
>
> Thir breeks o' mine, my only pair,
> That ance were plush, o' guid blue hair.
> Burns, Tam o' Shanter.

★Thir and thae, these and those. [Scotch.]

third[1] (thėrd), a. and n. [Also dial. thrid; < ME. thirde, thyrde, thryd, thridde, thredde, < AS. thridda (ONorth. thirda, thirdda) = OS. thriddio = D. derde = MLG. dridde, drudde, LG. drudde = OHG. dritto, MHG. Dan. tredie = Goth. thridja = W. tryde = Gael. treas = L. tertius (> It. terzo = Sp. tercio = Pg. terço = OF. tiers, ters, F. tiers, > E. tierce, terce) = Gr. τρίτος (with slightly different suffix) = Skt. tritiya, third; with ordinal formative -th > -d (see -th[2]), from the cardinal, AS. threó, etc., three: see three. From the L. form are ult. E. terce, tercel, tierce, etc., tertian, tertiary, etc.] I. a. 1. Next after the second: an ordinal numeral.

> The thridde nyght, as olde bookes seyn.
> Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 605.
>
> The thirden tune that it play'd then . . .
> Was "Wae to my sister, fair Ellen."
> The Twa Sisters (Child's Ballads, II. 243).

2. Being one of three equal subdivisions: as, the third part of anything.—Propositions of third adjacent. See adjacent.—The third hour, the third of twelve hours reckoned from sunrise to sunset; the hour midway between sunrise and noon; specifically, the canonical hour of terce. Among the Jews the third hour was the hour of the morning sacrifice.—Third base. See base-ball, 1.—Third cousin, the child of a parent's second cousin; a cousin in the third generation.—Third-day, Tuesday as the third day of the week: so called by the Friends.

> At Harlingen [a monthly meeting should be established] upon the third third-day of the month.
> Penn, Travels in Holland, etc.

Third estate. See estate.—Third father, a great-grandfather. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—Third figure, in logic. See figure, 9.—Third house, the lobby which connects itself with a legislature (so called because the latter commonly consists of two houses). [Political slang, U. S.]—Third inversion. See inversion (c).—Third nerve, in anat., that one of the cranial nerves, in order from before backward, which comes off from the brain next after the optic or second nerve; the oculimotor.—Third of exchange. See first of exchange, under exchange.—Third opponent, in Louisiana law, one interposing for relief against judicial sale of property in an action to which he was not a party.—Third order, perfection, person. See the nouns.—Third point. See tierce point, under tierce.—Third possessor, in Louisiana law, one who acquires the title to property which is subject to a mortgage to which he is not a party.—Third staff, in music for the organ, the staff used for the pedal part.—Third-year man, a senior sophister. See sophister, 3.

II. n. 1. One of three equal parts into which a unit or total may be divided.

> I forȝeue to ȝou the prices of salt, and forȝeue . . . the thriddis of seed. Wyclif, 1 Mac. x. 29.
>
> To thee and thine hereditary ever > Remain this ample third of our fair kingdom.
> Shak., Lear, i. 1. 82.

2. pl. In Eng. and Amer. law, the third part of the husband's personal property, which goes to the widow absolutely in the case of his dying intestate leaving a child or descendant, given (with various qualifications) by the common law and by modern statutes. The word is sometimes, however, loosely used as synonymous with dower, to denote her right to one third of the real property for life.

3. The sixtieth of a second of time or arc.

> Divide the natural day into twenty-four equal parts, an hour into sixty minutes, a minute into sixty seconds, a second into sixty thirds. Holder, On Time.

4. In music: (a) A tone on the third degree above or below a given tone; the next tone but one in a diatonic series. (b) The interval between any tone and a tone on the third degree above or below it. (c) The harmonic combination of two tones at the interval thus defined. (d) In a scale, the third tone from the bottom; the mediant: solmizated mi. The typical interval of the third is that between the first and third tones of a major scale, which is acoustically represented by the ratio 4:5. Such a third is called major; a third a half-step shorter is called minor or lesser; and one two half-steps shorter is called diminished. Major and minor thirds are classed as consonances; diminished thirds as dissonances. In ancient and in early medieval music, however, the major third was dissonant, because tuned according to the Pythagorean system, so as to have the ratio 64:81; such a third is called Pythagorean. The interval of the third is highly important harmonically, since it determines the major or minor character of triads. See triad and chord.

5. In base-ball, same as third base. See base-ball, 1.—Thirds card, a card 1½ by 3 inches, the size most used for a man's visiting-card. [Eng.]

third[1] (thėrd), v. t. [< third[1], a.] To work at or treat a third time: as, to third turnips (that is, to hoe them a third time). Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

third[2] (thėrd), n. [A transposed form of thread, thrid[1].] Thread. [Prov. Eng.]

> For as a subtle spider, closely sitting
> In centre of her web that spreadeth round,
> If the least fly but touch the smallest third,
> She feels it instantly.
> A. Brewer, Lingua (ed. 1617), iv. 6. (Nares.)
>
> Your compensation makes amends, for I
> Haue giuen you here a third of mine owne life [Miranda].
> Shak., Tempest (folio 1623), iv. 1. 3.

third-borough (thėrd′bur″ō), n. [Also third-borow, thridborro, tharborough; < third[1] + borough[1] as in headborough.] A constable, or an under-constable.

> Hobb Andrw he was thridborro;
> He bad hom, Pesse! God gyff hom sorro!
> For y mey arrest yow best.
> Hunttyng of the Hare, 199. (Halliwell.)
>
> I know my remedy; I must go fetch the third-borough.
> Shak., T. of the S., Ind., i. 12.

third-class (thėrd′klȧs), a. Belonging to the next class after the second: specifically noting the third grade of conveyances or accommodations for travel.—Third-class matter, in the postal system of the United States, printed matter other than newspapers or periodicals, sent through the mails by the publishers.

thirdendeal (thėr′dn-dēl), n. [< ME. thredendel, thriddendele, < AS. thridda dǽl (= MHG. drittel, G. drittel = Sw. tredjedel = Dan. trediedel), the third part: see third[1] and deal[1], and cf. halfendeal.] 1†. The third part of anything; specifically, a tertian, as the third part of a tun.

> The fistulose and softer lete it goone
> To cover with, and tweyne of lyme in oon
> Of gravel mynge, and marl in floode gravel
> A thriddendele wol sadde it wonder wel.
> Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 14.

In the Rot. Parl. A. D. 1423, mention is made of a "thredendels, or tercyan," 84 gallons of wine, or the third part of a "tonel." Prompt. Parv., p. 117, note 1.

2. A liquid measure containing three pints. Bailey, 1731; Halliwell. [Doubtful.]

thirding (thėr′ding), n. [< third[1] + -ing[1]. Cf. thriding, riding[2].] 1. The third part of anything; specifically, the third part of the grain growing on a tenant's land at his death, in some places due to the lord as a heriot. Bailey, 1731. Also in plural.—2. A custom practised at the English universities, where two thirds of the original price is allowed by the upholsterers to students for household goods returned to them within the year. Halliwell.—3. Same as riding[2]. Urry, MS. Additions to Ray. (Halliwell.) thirdly (thėrd′li), adv. [< third[1] + -ly[2].] In the third place.

thirdpenny (thėrd′pen″i), n. [< third[1] + penny.] In Anglo-Saxon law, a third part of the fines imposed at the county courts, which was one of the perquisites of the earl of the district.

third-rate (thėrd′rāt), a. 1. Of the third rate or order. For the specific naval use, see rate[2], n., 8. Hence—2. Of a distinctly inferior rank, grade, or quality: as, a third-rate hotel; a third-rate actor.

> From that time Port Royal fell prostrate from its position of a great provincial mercantile centre into that of a third-rate naval station. Harper's Mag., LXXX. 381.

thirdsman (thėrdz′man), n.; pl. thirdsmen (-men). [< thirds for third + man.] An umpire; an arbitrator; a mediator.

> Ay, but Mac Callum More's blood wadna sit down wi' that; there was risk of Andro Ferrara coming in thirdsman. Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xxiv.

thirl[1] (thėrl), n. [Also thurl; < ME. *thirl, thirll, therl, thyrl, thorl, thurl, < AS. thyrel, a hole, perforation, < thyrel, adj., perforated, pierced, orig. thyrhel* = OHG. durihhil, durchil, MHG. durchel, durkel, perforated, pierced; with formative -el, from the root of AS. thurh, etc., thorough, through: see thorough, through. Hence thirl[1], v., and by transposition thrill[1], n. and v., and in comp. nosethirl, nostril.] 1. A hole; an opening; a place of entrance, as a door or a window. [Prov. Eng. or Scotch.]

2. In coal-mining, a short passage cut for ventilation between two headings; a cross-hole. Also thirling.—Stoop and thirl. See stoop[4].

thirl[1] (thėrl), v. [< ME. thirlen, thirllen, thyrlen, therlen, thurlen, thorlen, < AS. thyrlian, thirlian, thyrelian, bore, < thyrel, a hole, perforation: see thirl[1], n. Cf. thrill[1], a transposed form.] I. trans. 1. To pierce; bore; perforate; drill.

> Thenn thurled thay ayther thik side thurg, bi the rybbe.
> Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 1357.
>
> That he was myghtful and meke, and mercy gan graunte
> To hem that henge hym hye and hus herte therlede.
> Piers Plowman (C), ii. 171.

2. To produce, as a hole, by piercing, boring, or drilling.

> As also that the forcible and violent push of the ram had thirled an hole through a corner-tower.
> Ammianus Marcellinus (1609). (Nares.)

3. Figuratively, to penetrate; pierce, as with some keen emotion; especially, to wound.

> So harde hacches [aches] of loue here hert hadde thirled
> That ther nas gle vnder God that hire glad mi3t.
> William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 826.

> Mir. for Mags., p. 495. (Nares.)

4. To cause to vibrate, quiver, or tingle; thrill.

> There was ae sang, amang the rest; . . .
> It thirl'd the heart-strings thro' the breast.
> Burns, First Epistle to J. Lapraik.

II. intrans. 1. To make a hole, as by piercing or boring.

> So thirleth with the poynt of remembraunce
> The swerd of sorowe.
> Chaucer, Anelida and Arcite, l. 211.
>
> Schalkes they schotte thrughe schrenkande maylez, > Thurghe brenys browdene brestez they thirllede.
> Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 1858.

2. To vibrate; quiver; tingle; thrill.

> Nor that night-wandering, pale, and watery star
> (When yawning dragons draw her thirling car . . .).
> Marlowe and Chapman, Hero and Leander, i. 108.
>
> And then he speaks with sic a taking art,
> His words they thirle like musick thro' my heart.
> Ramsay, Gentle Shepherd, i. 2 (song 5).

3. In coal-mining, to cut away the last web of coal separating two headings or other workings. Gresley.

[Prov. Eng. or Scotch in all senses.]

thirl[2] (thėrl), v. t. [For therl*, a transposed form of thrill[2], threl, a var. of thrall, v.] To thrall, bind, or subject; especially, to bind or astrict by the terms of a lease or otherwise: as, lands thirled to a particular mill. See thirlage. [Scotch.]

> The inhabitants of the village and barony of Kinross were not more effectually thirled (which may be translated enthralled) to the baron's mill than they were to the medical monopoly of the chamberlain. Scott, Abbot, xxvi.

thirl[2] (thėrl), n. [Cf. thirl[2], v.] In Scots law, a tract of land the tenants of which were bound to bring all their grain to a certain mill: same as sucken.

thirlable (thėr′la-bl), a. [< ME. thirlabille; < thirl[1] + -able.] Capable of being thirled; penetrable. Halliwell. [Obsolete or provincial.]

thirlage (thėr′lāj), n. [< thirl[2] + -age.] In Scots law, a species of servitude, formerly very common in Scotland, and also prevalent in England, by which the proprietors or other possessors of lands were bound to carry the grain produced on the lands to a particular mill to be ground, to which mill the lands were said to be thirled or astricted, and also to pa a certain proportion of the grain, varying in different cases, as a remuneration for the grinding, and for the expense of the erection and maintenance of the mill. Also called sequel.

thirled† (thėrld), a. [< ME. thirled, thorled, thurled; < thirl[1] + -ed[2].] Having thirls or openings; specifically, having nostrils.

Thaire eres shorte and sharppe, thaire een steep, Thaire noses thorled wyde and patent be.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 133.

thirling (thėr'ling), n. [Also thurling; < ME. thurlunge, < AS. thyrelung, verbal n. of thyrelian, perforate: see thirl[1], v.] 1. The act of boring or perforating.—2. In coal-mining, same as thirl[1], 2; in the lead-mines of the north of England, a mark indicating the termination of a set or pitch. R. Hunt.

thirst (thėrst), n. [Early mod. Ir. tart, thirst, drought, etc. From the L. source are ult. E. torrent, torrid, terra, terrene[1], terrestrial, inter[1], etc.] 1. A feeling of dryness in the mouth and throat; the uncomfortable sensations arising from the want of fluid nutriment; the uneasiness or suffering occasioned by want of drink; vehement desire for drink. The sensations of thirst are chiefly referred to the thorax and fauces, but the condition is really one affecting the entire body. The excessive pains of thirst compared with those of hunger are due to the fact that the deprivation of liquids is a condition with which all the tissues sympathize. Every solid and every fluid of the body contains water, and hence abstraction or diminution of the watery constituents is followed by a general depression of the whole system. Thirst is a common symptom of febrile and other diseases. Death from thirst, as of persons in a desert, appears to be invariably preceded by acute mania.

Than he commanded him to Presoun, and alle his Tresoure aboute him; and so he dyed for Hungre and Threst.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 230.

Raymounde tho lepte vp hys coursere vppon,
To the fantain and wel of thrust gan to go.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 765.

Among sensations of Organic Life, I may cite Thirst as remarkable for the urgency of its pressure upon the will.
A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 318.

2. Figuratively, an ardent desire for anything; a craving.

Over all the countrie she did raunge
To seeke young men to quench her flaming thrust.
Spenser, F. Q., III. vii. 50.

Yet do their beating breasts demand the strife,
And thirst of glory quells the love of life.
Addison, The Campaign.

To experience uncomfortable sensations for want of drink; have desire to drink; be dry.

If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink. Rom. xii. 20.

2. To have a vehement desire; crave.

My soul thirsteth for God. Ps. xlii. 2.

Although the beauties, riches, honours, sciences, virtues, and perfections of all men living were in the present possession of one, yet somewhat beyond and above all this there would still be sought and earnestly thirsted for.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 11.

He thirsted for all liberal knowledge.
Milton, Hist. Eng., v.

II. trans. To have a thirst for, literally or figuratively; desire ardently; crave: now usually followed by an infinitive as the object.

The eternal God must be prayed to, . . . who also grant them once earnestly to thirst his true doctrine, contained in the sweet and pure fountains of his scriptures.
Tyndale, Ans. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc., 1850), p. 283.

That unhappy king, my master, whom
I so much thirst to see. Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 524.

He seeks his Keeper's Flesh, and thirsts his Blood.
Prior, Solomon, i.

thirster (thėrs'tėr), n. [< thirst + -er[1].] One who or that which thirsts.

Having seriously pleaded the case with thy heart, and reverently pleaded the case with God, thou hast pleaded thyself from . . . a lover of the world to a thirster after God. Baxter, Saints' Rest, iv. 13.

thirstily (thėrs'ti-li), adv. In a thirsty manner.

From such Fountain he drawe, diligently, thirstily.
Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, ii. 3.

II. n. 1. The number which consists of the sum of twelve and one, or of ten and three.—2. A symbol representing thirteen units, as 13, XIII, or xiii.—3. A silver shilling worth 13 pence, current in Ireland during the early part of the nineteenth century.

F. A. M. is doubtless chronologically correct as to the shilling in Ireland having been worth thirteen pence previous to 1825–6, but colloquially it continued to be called a thirteen to a considerably later period—so late as 1835 to my knowledge. N. and Q., 7th ser., I. 77.

thirteener (thėr'tēn'ėr), n. [< thirteen + -er[1].] 1. Same as thirteen, 3. [Colloq.]

For it was a shillin' he gave me, glory be to God. No, I niver heard it called a thirteener before, but mother has.
Quoted in Mayhew's London Labour and London Poor, [I. 484.

2. The thirteenth one of any number of things; specifically, in whist, the last card of a suit left in the hands of a player after the other twelve have been played.

thirteen-lined (thėr'tēn'līnd), a. Noting the leopard spermophile, or Hood's marmot, Spermophilus tridecemlineatus, a very common striped and spotted ground-squirrel of North America. The allusion is to the number of stripes (representing the thirteen original States) in the flag of the United States, suggested by the markings of the animal. See cut under Spermophilus.

thirteenth (thėr'tēnth'), a. and n. [Altered to suit the form of thirteen; < ME. threttethe, also (after Icel.) threttende, < AS. threótéotha = OFries. thredtinda = D. dertiende = OHG. dritzēndo, MHG. dritzehende, drīzehende, G. dreizehnte = Icel. threttandi = Sw. trettonde = Dan. trettende = Goth. thridjataihunda;* as thirteen + -th[2].] I. a. 1. Next after the twelfth: an ordinal numeral.—2. Constituting any one of thirteen equal parts into which anything is divided.—Thirteenth cranial nerve†, the chorda tympani regarded as distinct from the seventh or facial nerve. Sapolini.

II. n. 1. One of thirteen equal parts into which anything is divided.—2. In early Eng. law, a thirteenth part of the rents of the year, or of movables, or both, granted or levied by way of tax.—3. In music, the interval, whether melodic or harmonic, between any tone and a tone one octave and six degrees distant from it; also, a tone distant by such an interval from a given tone; a compound sixth.

thirtieth (thėr'ti-eth), a. and n. [Altered to suit the mod. form thirty; < ME. thrittithe, thrittuthe, thrittazte, < AS. thrītigotha, etc.; as thirty + -eth[2].] I. a. 1. They were carried on at first by the Protestants of Bohemia and various Protestant German states against the Catholic League headed by Austria. Afterward Sweden and later France joined the former side, and Spain became allied with the latter.

II. n. 1. The number which consists of three times ten.—2. A symbol representing thirty units, as 30, XXX, or xxx.—3. In printing and teleg., the last sheet, word, or line of copy or of a despatch.

thirtyfold (thėr'ti-fōld), a. Thirty times as much or as many. Mat. xiii. 8.

Thirty-nine Articles. See article.

thirty-one (thėr'ti-wun'), n. A game resembling vingt-un, but with a longer reckoning.

thirty-second (thėr'ti-sek'ond), a. Second in order after the thirtieth.

thirty-second-note (thėr'ti-sek'ond-nōt), n. In musical notation, a note equivalent in time-value to one half of a sixteenth-note; a demi-semiquaver.—Thirty-second-note rest. See rest[1], 8 (b).

thirtytwo-mo (thėr'ti-tō'mō), n. [An E. reading of 32*mo*, for XXXII*mo*, L. (in) tricesimo secundo, 'in thirty-second.'] 1. Thirty-two pages of printing types arranged in one or two forms to produce thirty-two printed pages on leaves of equal size.—2. The folding in sixteen equal parts of a sheet of paper. When the size of paper is not specified, medium thirty-two-mo, about 3 by 4½ inches, is understood.

Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 5.

From the town you last came through, called Brailsford, it is five miles; and you are not yet above half a mile on this side. Cotton, in Walton's Angler, ii. 222.

(b) Time just past or just at hand; the last or the next. The reference, whether to past or to future, is determined by the circumstances; this evening may mean either the evening now approaching, or next to come, or the evening now present, or the evening just past: as, it has occurred twice this year; I shall take care not to fail this (next) time. In this connection this is sometimes used for these, the sum being reckoned up, as it were, in a total.

The owle ek, which that hette Ascaphilo, thickly cylindrical heads with purple, yellow, or white flowers and no rays, and dispersing their seed by the aid of a light globe of pappus. The name applies in general to the members of the genus Carduus (including the former Cirsium), the common or plumed thistle, in which the pappus is plumose or feathered, also the plumeless thistle, in which the pappus is simple, and of Onopordon, the cotton-thistle, also with qualifying words to plants of other genera.—Argentine thistle†, an old name of the cotton-thistle. See Onopordon.—Blessed thistle, one of the star-thistles, Cnicus benedictus, once reputed to counteract poison. It is a low branching annual with lobed, weakly prickly leaves and light-yellow heads, 1½ inches high, sparingly naturalized from Europe southward in the United States.—Boar-thistle, a frequent variant of bur-thistle.—Bull-thistle, a name in America of Carduus lanceolatus (see common thistle, below): cited also from Ireland.—Canada thistle, the usual name in the United States of Carduus arvensis, the corn-thistle, or creeping thistle, of Great Britain: a native of Europe and Asia, thence spread to North America and other lands. It is less robust than many other thistles, being only a foot or two high and rather slender, and bears very prickly pinnatifid leaves and numerous small purple-flowered heads. It is one of the very worst of weeds on account of its deep-laid, extensively creeping, and sprouting rootstock.—Carline thistle. See Carlina.—Common thistle, in general, a plant of the genus Carduus; specifically, C. lanceolatus, the spear-, bur-, or bull-thistle. It is a stout branching plant from 2 to 4 feet high, with very prickly decurrent leaves and handsome purple heads—a troublesome weed, but without perennial creeping rootstock.—Corn-thistle. See Canada thistle.—Cotton thistle. See cotton-thistle, Onopordon, and Scotch thistle (below).—Creeping thistle. See Canada thistle.—Cursed thistle, the creeping or Canada thistle.—Distaff-thistle, a thistle-like plant, Carthamus lanatus, of Europe and Asia: an erect, rigid, cobwebby species with large pale-yellow heads.—Dwarf thistle. Same as stemless thistle.—Fish-bone or herring-bone thistle, Carduus Casabonæ, found on islands off the south coast of France. The name doubtless alludes to the spines, borne in threes on the margin of the leaves.—Friar's thistle. Same as friar's-crown.—Fuller's-thistle, the teazel.—Globe thistle. (a) See globe-thistle. (b) The artichoke.—Golden thistle, a name for yellow-flowered species of the composite genus Scolymus, one of which is the Spanish oyster-plant. See oyster-plant.—Hare- or hare's thistle. Same as hare's-lettuce.—Herring-bone thistle. See fish-bone thistle, above.—Holy thistle. Same as blessed thistle, above.

The devices of the order are St. Andrew's cross, or saltier, and a thistle-flower with leaves; these enter into the different badges, the collar, star, etc. The motto is "Nemo me impune lacessit." The ribbon is green.—Pasture-thistle, a low stout species, Carduus odoratus, with from one to three very large purple, or rarely white, sweet-scented heads: found in the Atlantic United States.—Saffron-thistle, the safflower.—St. Barnaby's thistle, the yellow star-thistle, Centaurea solstitialis: so named as blooming about St. Barnaby's day.—Scotch thistle, a kind of thistle regarded as the national emblem of Scotland, but the precise species to which the name properly belongs is not settled. Most authorities consider it to be the cotton-thistle, Onopordon Acanthium, though this is not native in Scotland; others, the milk-thistle, Mariana Mariana; while some, with greater probability, refer it to the common Carduus lanceolatus. The thistle intended when the emblem came into use is uncertain, owing to the fact that the figures on old coins and in paintings were not meant to be botanically exact. See cuts above and under Onopordon.—Spear-thistle, the common thistle, Carduus lanceolatus: so called from its lance-shaped leaves.—Stemless thistle, a European thistle, Carduus acaulis, having a tuft of prickly spreading leaves and a few largish purple heads, scarcely rising above the ground. Also dwarf thistle, and locally pod-thistle.—Swamp-thistle, a tall species, Carduus muticus, with single or few deep-purple heads on the branches: found in damp soil in the eastern United States.—Swine-thistle. Same as sow-thistle.—Syrian thistle, Carduus Syriacus, of the Mediterranean region. It is a plant from 1 to 4 feet high, with milky-veined leaves, the heads, one to three, on short axillary branches, each head embraced by a rigid pinnatifid spiny-pointed bract.—Tall thistle, a common species of the United States east of the Mississippi, Carduus altissimus, a branching plant sometimes 10 feet high, the leaves covered with close white wool beneath, the flowers light-purple.—Virgin Mary's thistle. Same as milk-thistle.—Way-thistle, the Canada thistle.—Welted thistle, an old-world species, Carduus acanthoides, resembling the musk-thistle.—Wolves'- or wolf's-thistle†, Carlina acaulis.—Woolly-headed thistle. Same as friar's-crown.—Yellow thistle, Carduus spinosissimus, of the eastern and southern United States, a stout plant from 1 to 3 feet high, with spiny leaves and pale-yellow or purple heads. Thomisidæ (thō-mis'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Thomisus + -idæ.] A family of laterigrade spiders, typified by the genus Thomisus. The species are numerous and wide-spread. They are mostly known as crab-spiders, from their peculiar manner of running sidewise or backward, as a crab is supposed to do, and also from their general shape, the body being broad and the legs, or some of them, being usually held bent forward and moved like those of the crustaceans whose appearance is thus suggested.

Thomism (tō'mizm), n. [< Thom-as + -ism.] The body of theological teachings claimed by its professors to be, especially on the subject of grace, the pure doctrine of Thomas Aquinas, the eminent theologian of the 13th century (died 1274). Thomism teaches that efficacious grace adds physical predetermination to sufficient grace; but in such a way that there is an infallible connection between it and its effect; not only a connection of infallible foreknowledge, but of causality on the part of God. Nor is this infallibility of effect founded on the foreknowledge of our consent, but, on the contrary, the foreknowledge of our consent is based on the infallibility of the divine causality.

Thomist (tō'mist), n. and a. [< Thom-as + -ist.]
I. n. A follower of Thomas Aquinas.

Scotists and Thomists now in peace remain.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 444.

Thomists, a name often given to the followers of Thomas Aquinas, who, besides adopting the Aristotelian philosophy, in opposition to Duns Scotus, who held the Platonic, also taught the doctrines of Augustine on the subject of original sin, free grace, etc. He condemned the dogma of the immaculate conception, in opposition to Scotus. The two sects were also divided on the question of the sacraments, as to whether grace was conferred by them physically or morally—the Thomists holding the former, the Scotists the latter. . . . The Thomists were Realists, while the Scotists were Nominalists; and although the Roman see naturally inclined to favor the doctrines of the Scotists, the prestige of Aquinas was so great that the Thomists ruled the theology of the Church up to the time of the controversy between the Molinists and the Jansenists, when the views of the Scotists substantially prevailed.
McClintock and Strong, Cyclopædia of Biblical, etc., Literature, x. 373.

II. a. Same as Thomistic.

The recent revival in different countries of the Thomist philosophy, now again authoritatively proclaimed to be the sheet-anchor of Catholic doctrine. Mind, IX. 159.

Thomistic (tō-mis'tik), a. [< Thomist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Thomists or Thomism. [Rare.]

Yet in the Thomistic system the ancient thinker often conquers the Christian. Mind, XI. 445.

Thomistical (tō-mis'ti-kal), a. [< Thomistic + -al.] In the manner of the Thomists, or of Thomas Aquinas; subtle; over-refined.

How far, lo! M. More, is this your strange Thomistical sense [interpretation] from the flat letter?
Tyndale, Supper of the Lord (ed. Parker Soc.), p. 244.

Thomisus (thō'mis-us), n. [NL. (Walckenaer), < Gr. θῶμιξ (-ιγγ-), cord, string.] The typical genus of Thomisidæ, or crab-spiders.

Thomite (tō'mīt), n. [< Thom-as + -ite[2].] Same as Thomæan.

Thomomys (thō'mō-mis), n. [NL. (Maximilian, 1839), < Gr. θωμός, a heap, + μῦς = E. mouse.] 1. One of two genera of Geomyidæ or pocket-gophers, differing from Geomys in having the upper incisors smooth or with only a fine marginal (not median) groove. The external ears, though small, have a distinct auricle; the fore feet are moderately fossorial; and none of the species are as large as those of Geomys. They range from British America to Mexico, and from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific. The northern form is T. talpoides; a western is T. bulbivorus, the camass-rat of the Pacific slope; a southern is T. toltecus; the smallest is described as T. clusius, of the Rocky Mountain region, about five inches long. In habits these gophers closely resemble the species of Geomys. The generic name indicates the little piles of earth with which they soon dot the surface of the soft soil in which they work. See cut under camass-rat. There are many species.

2. [l. c.] A member of this genus.

Thomsen's disease. [Named after Dr. Thomsen of Schleswig-Holstein, who was himself a sufferer from the disease, and the first to describe it.] An affection characterized by inability to relax at once certain groups of muscles that have been contracted after a period of rest. It runs in families, beginning very early in life. Also called myotonia congenita.

Thomson effect. See effect.

Thomsonian (tom-sō'ni-an), a. and n. [< Thomson (Dr. Samuel Thomson, of Massachusetts, 1769–1843) + -i-an.] I. a. Noting or pertaining to a system of botanical medicine, one of whose doctrines is that, as all minerals are from the earth, their tendency is to carry men into their graves, whereas the tendency of herbs, from their growing upward, is to keep men out of their graves.

II. n. An adherent of the Thomsonian theory.

Thomsonianism (tom-sō'ni-an-izm), n. [< Thomsonian + -ism.] The principles of the Thomsonian school.

The career of Thomson was unique, and even to this day Thomsonianism has its votaries, and lobelia and rum sweats are retained with the tenacity of old friends.
Pop. Sci. News, XXIII. 61.

thomsonite (tom'son-īt), n. [< Thomson (Thomas Thomson, a Scottish chemist, 1773–1852) + -ite[2].] A mineral of the zeolite family, occurring generally in masses of a radiated structure, in spherical concretions or compact. It is a hydrous silicate of aluminium, calcium, and sodium.

Thomson's electrometer, mirror-galvanometer, siphon-recorder, etc. See electrometer, galvanometer, etc.

thong (thông), n. [< ME. thong, thwong, thwang, < AS. thwang, thwong (= Icel. thvengr), thong, latchet, esp. of shoes, < thwingan* (thwang* in pret.), constrain: see twinge.] A long narrow strip of leather; a narrow strap, used as a fastening, a halter, reins, the lash of a whip, the latchet of a shoe, and in many other ways. See cut under snow-shoe.

Queme quysseᵴwes [cuisses] then, that coyntlych closed
His thik thrawen thyȝez, with thwonges to-tachched.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 579.

After cutte that pece into thwanges smal,
Lete it not be brode, but narow as may be.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 568.

A lethern thong doth serve his wast to girt.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 27.

From the high box they [coachmen] whirl the thong around,
And with the twining lash their shins resound.
Gay, Trivia, iii. 37.

thong (thông), v. [< ME. thwongen; < thong, n.]
I.† trans. To provide, fit, or fasten with a thong.

Thongede scheon. Ancren Riwle, p. 362.

II. intrans. 1. To strike with a thong, or with a similar implement, as the lash of a whip.

She has hit Mrs. Bonnington on the raw place, and smilingly proceeds to thong again.
Thackeray, Lovel the Widower, iv.

2. To rope; stretch out into viscous threads or filaments. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

thong-seal (thông'sēl), n. The bearded seal, Erignathus barbatus. See cut under Erignathus.

thongy (thông'i), a. [< thong + -y[1].] Ropy; viscid. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

thonk, n. and v. An obsolete or dialectal form of thank.

thonwange†, n. See thunwange.

thoöid (thō'oid), a. and n. [< Gr. θώς (θωός), a beast of prey of the wolf kind, + εἶδος, form.]
I. a. Wolfish; resembling or related to the wolf; lupine: as, "the thoöid or lupine series" of canines, W. H. Flower.

II. n. A member of the thoöid or lupine series of canine quadrupeds, as a wolf, dog, or jackal: as, "thoöids, or lupine forms," Huxley.

thoom (thōm), n. A dialectal form of thumb[1].

Thor (thôr), n. [< Icel. Thōrr, a contr. of Thonrr* = AS. Thunor: see thunder and Thursday.] 1. The second principal god of the ancient Scandinavians, the god of thunder. He was the son of Odin, or the supreme being, and Jörth, the earth. He was the champion of the gods, and was called in to their assistance whenever they were in straits. He was also the friend of mankind, and the slayer of trolls and evil spirits. He always carried a heavy hammer (mjölnir, the crusher), which, as often as he discharged it, returned to his hand of itself; he possessed a girdle which had the virtue of renewing his strength. Thor is represented as a powerful man in the prime of life, with a long red beard, a crown on his head, a scepter in one hand, and his hammer in the other. Thursday is called after him, and his name enters as an element into a great many proper names.

2. [NL.] In zoöl., a genus of macrurous crustaceans. J. S. Kingsley, 1878.—Thor's day. See Thursday.—Thor's hammer. See hammer[1].

thoracabdominal (thō″rak-ab-dom'i-nal), a. [< thorax (thorac-) + abdomen: see abdominal.] Pertaining or common to the thorax and the abdomen: as, the thoracabdominal cavity of any vertebrate below a mammal.

thoracacromial (thō″rak-a-krō'mi-al), a. [< L. thorax (thorac-), the thorax, + NL. acromion: see acromial.] Of or pertaining to the chest and the shoulder, or the thorax and the pectoral arch; acromiothoracic: specifically noting a group of muscles. Coues, 1887.

thoracaorta (thō″rak-ā-ôr'tä), n.; pl. thoracaortæ (-tē). [NL., < thorax (thorac-) + aorta.] The thoracic aorta, contained in the cavity of the thorax, and with which the abdominal aorta is continuous. See cut under thorax. Coues.

thoracentesis (thō″ra-sen-tē'sis), n. [NL., for thoracocentesis*, < L. thorax (thorac-), the thorax, + Gr. κέντησις, < κεντεῖν, puncture: see center[1].] The operation of puncturing the chest, as in hydrothorax or empyema, and withdrawing the contained fluid; paracentesis thoracis.

thoraces, n. Plural of thorax.

thoracetron (thō-ra-sē'tron), n.; pl. thoracetra (-trä). [NL., < L. thorax (thorac-), the thorax, + Gr. ἤτρον, the abdomen.] The thorax, or second division of the body, of some crustaceans, as the king-crab: correlated with cephaletron and pleon. Owen, 1872.

thoracic (thō-ras'ik), a. and n. [= F. thoracique = Sp. torácico = Pg. thoracico = It. toracico, < NL. thoracicus*, < L. thorax (thorac-), the thorax: see thorax.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the thorax or chest: as, thoracic walls, contents, organs, or structures. (a) Contained in the thorax; intrathoracic: as, the thoracic viscera. (b) Dorsal, as a vertebra which bears functional ribs; entering into the formation of the thorax: specifically noting such vertebræ (all vertebræ being dorsal in one sense). (c) Pertaining to the head and thorax of some animals; cephalothoracic: as, thoracic appendages. (d) Attached to the thorax: as, thoracic limbs or appendages; the thoracic girdle (that is, the pectoral arch, or shoulder-girdle, of a vertebrate); pectoral in position, as the ventral fins of some fishes. (e) Pertaining to the front and sides of the thorax or to the breast; pectoral: as, the mammary glands of man are thoracic. (f) Done or effected by means of the thorax: as, thoracic respiration. (g) Affecting the thorax or its organs: as, thoracic diseases, symptoms, or remedies. 2. Having a thorax (of this or that kind); belonging to the Thoracica: as, the thoracic cirripeds.—3. Having the ventral fins thoracic in position; belonging to the Thoracici: as, a thoracic fish.—Thoracic angles, the corners of the thorax, or of the prothorax in insects with wing-covers.—Thoracic aorta, that section of the aorta which traverses the cavity of the thorax. It extends from the origin of the vessel to its passage through the aortic orifice of the diaphragm, where it becomes the abdominal aorta. The term is also restricted to the straight or descending part of the aorta (excluding the arch). In this sense the thoracic aorta begins where the arch ends, about opposite the fifth thoracic vertebra. The branches of the thoracic aorta are the pericardial, bronchial (the nutrient vessels of the lungs), esophageal, postmediastinal, and the usually ten pairs of intercostals. See cuts under diaphragm and thorax.—Thoracic artery, one of several branches given off by the axillary artery in the second and third sections of its course, and distributed chiefly to the pectoral muscles and adjacent soft tissues. Four such vessels are named in man as the superior, acromial, long, and alar. They are also called suprathoracic, acromiothoracic or thoracacromial or thoracico-acromial, longithoracic, and alithoracic.—Thoracic axis, the common trunk of the acromiothoracic and superior thoracic arteries, when these are given off together.—Thoracic duct See duct, and cut under diaphragm.—Thoracic ganglia. See ganglion.—Thoracic girdle, the pectoral girdle, or scapular arch. See cuts under epipleura, omosternum, and sternum.—Thoracic grooving, the longitudinal depressions along the sternum on either side in rachitic or pigeon breasted children.—Thoracic index, the ratio between the antero-posterior and transverse diameters of the thorax.—Thoracic limbs, the fore limbs of a vertebrate; the arms of a man, fore legs of a quadruped, wings of a bird pectoral fins of a fish; the appendages of the scapular arch, or shoulder-girdle; in invertebrates, the appendages proper to the thorax, generally the ambulatory and chelate, as distinguished from abdominal appendages, mouth-parts, etc. See cut under Araneida.—Thoracic nerves. (a) Anterior thoracic, two branches, the external and internal, arising from the outer and inner cords of the brachial plexus and distributed to the pectorales muscles. (b) Posterior thoracic, a branch from the upper two or three nerves of the brachial plexus, passing on the side of the chest to be distributed to the serratus magnus. Also called long thoracic, and external respiratory nerve of Bell.—Thoracic parietes, the walls of the chest; especially, the movable front and sides of the chest, whose bony basis is the ribs and sternum.—Thoracic region. (a) The extent or superficies of the thorax as a part of the body; some part of the thoracic walls, with reference to groups of muscles which lie upon them: as, the anterior or lateral thoracic region. (b) Especially, one of the several parts into which the surface of the human thorax is divided or mapped out by certain imaginary lines, which to some extent denote the situation of the contained viscera, and thus serve for medical and surgical purposes. These regions, unlike some of the corresponding abdominal regions, are all in pairs (right and left), in one nomenclature known as the humeral, subclavian, mammary, axillary, scapular, interscapular, and subscapular.—Thoracic region of the spine, that portion of the spine which is composed of thoracic vertebræ. Also called dorsal region.—Thoracic shield, one of the three plates covering the thoracic rings in insect larvæ.—Thoracic vertebra, any vertebra which bears a developed rib entering into the formation of a thorax. Also called dorsal vertebra.—Thoracic viscera, the viscera contained within the cavity of the thorax—namely, the heart, lungs, thymus, a section of the esophagus, thoracic duct, thoracic aorta, caval veins, and other large vessels.—Transverse thoracic furrow, in many Diptera, "a suture crossing the mesothorax and ending on each side a little before the base of the wing: its presence or absence, and form, are important characters in classification" (Osten Sacken).

II. n. 1. A thoracic structure; especially, a thoracic artery or nerve, or a rib-bearing dorsal vertebra.—2. A thoracic fish Thoracica (thō-ras'i-kä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of thoracicus:* see thoracic.] The principal group of the Cirripedia, by some recognized as an order, consisting of the ordinary sessile and pedunculated cirripeds, or barnacles and acorn-shells, in which the abdomen is rudimentary and there are six thoracic segments with as many pairs of cirrose limbs. See Cirripedia, Lepas, Balanus.

thoracicabdominal, thoracicacromial, a. Same as thoracabdominal, thoracacromial.

Thoracici† (thō-ras'i-sī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of thoracicus:* see thoracic.] In ichth., the third one of four Linnean orders of fishes (the others being Apodes, Jugulares, Abdominales), characterized by the thoracic position of the ventral fins, which are placed beneath the pectorals. By Cuvier and others the term has been recognized with various limitations, but it is no longer used in classifying fishes, though the adjective thoracic remains as a descriptive term in its original sense.

thoracico-acromialis (thō-ras″i-kō-a-krō-mi-ā'lis), n.; pl. thoracico-acromiales (-lēz). [NL., < thoracicus*, thoracic, + acromialis, acromial.] The acromiothoracic artery, a branch of the axillary, given off just above the pectoralis minor, and dividing into three sets of branches.

thoracicohumeral (thō-ras″i-kō-hū'mę-ral), a. [< NL. thoracicus*, thoracic, + humeralis, humeral.] Pertaining to the thorax and the humerus, or to the chest and the upper arm.

thoracicohumeralis (thō-ras″i-kō-hū-mę-rā'lis), n.; pl. thoracicohumerales (-lēz). [NL.: see thoracicohumeral.] An artery, a branch of the thoracico-acromialis, which descends upon the arm with the cephalic vein in the interval between the great pectoral and deltoid muscles.

thoraciform (thō-ras'i-fôrm), a. [< L. thorax (thorac-), the thorax, + forma, form.] In entom., noting the mesonotum when it is very large and forms the main part of the upper surface of the thorax, as in Diptera and most Hymenoptera.

thoracipod (thō-ras'i-pod), a. and n. [< L. thorax (thorac-), the thorax, + Gr. πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] I. a. Having thoracic limbs differentiated as ambulatory legs, as a crab or lobster; belonging to the Thoracipoda; malacostracous.

II. n. A member of the Thoracipoda; a crustacean which walks on specialized thoracic limbs (pereiopods); a malacostracan.

Thoracipoda (thō-ra-sip'ō-dä), n. pl. [NL.: see thoracipod.] In some systems, a subclass or superorder of Crustacea corresponding to Malacostraca; the higher series of crustaceans, contrasted with the entomostracans or Gnathopoda. The name refers to the fact that, the seven anterior or cephalic segments being specialized for sensation and nutrition, the next or thoracic segments distinctively subserve locomotion. The name is proposed as a substitute for Malacostraca. Encyc. Brit., VI. 655.

thoracipodous (thō-ra-sip'ō-dus), a. [< thoracipod + -ous.] Same as thoracipod.

thoracispinal (thō-ras-i-spī'nal), a. [< L. thorax (thorac-), the thorax, + spina, spine: see spinal.] Of or pertaining to the thoracic section of the spinal column: as, a thoracispinal nerve. Cones, 1887.

thoracodidymus (thō-rā-kō-did'i-mus), n.; pl. thoracodidymi (-mī). [NL., < Gr. θώραξ (θωρακ-), thorax, + δίδυμος, double.] In teratol., a double monster the two bodies of which are joined at the thorax.

thoracogastrodidymus (thō-rā-kō-gas-trō-did'i-mus), n.; pl. thoracogastrodidymi (-mī). [NL., < Gr. θώραξ (θωρακ-), thorax, + γαστήρ, stomach, + δίδυμος, double.] In teratol., a double monster with united thoraces and abdomen.

thoracometer (thō-ra-kom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. θώραξ (θωρακ-), the thorax, + μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring the range of respiratory movement of any point in the thorax.

thoracopagus (thō-ra-kop'a-gus), n.; pl. thoracopagi (-jī). [NL., < Gr. θώραξ (θωρακ-), the thorax, + πάγος, that which is firmly set.] In teratol., a double monster with more or less fusion of the thoraces.

thoracoplasty (thō-rā'kō-plas-ti), n. [< Gr. θώραξ (θωρακ-), thorax, + πλάσσειν, put in a certain form.] Removal of a section of one or more ribs for the cure of a fistula of the chest-wall following empyema.

Thoracostraca (thō-ra-kos'tra-kä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. θώραξ (θωρακ-), the thorax, + ὄστρακον, a shell.] In some systems, a division of malacostracous crustaceans, including the podophthalmous or stalk-eyed crustaceans, as crabs, shrimps, prawns, and lobsters: nearly conterminous with Podophthalma.

thoracostracous (thō-ra-kos'tra-kus), a. Pertaining to the Thoracostraca.

thoracotheca (thō-rā-kō-thē'kä), n.; pl. thoracothecæ (-sē). [NL., < Gr. θώραξ (θωρακ-), the thorax, + θήκη, a case.] In entom., the trunk-case of a pupa, or that part of the integument which covers the thorax. Also cytotheca.

thoracotomy (thō-ra-kot'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. θώραξ (θωρακ-), the thorax, + -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] In surg., the operation of free incision through the thoracic walls. Compare thoracentesis.

thorah, n. See torah.

thoral (thō'ral), a. [Prop. toral, < L. torus, ML. erroneously thorus, a cushion, couch, bed: see torus.] Of or pertaining to the marriage-bed; nuptial; specifically, in palmistry, noting the line or mark of Venus on the hand.

thorax (thō'raks), n.; pl. thoraces (thō-rā'sēz). [< L. thorax (thorac-), < Gr. θώραξ (θωρακ-), a breastplate, also the part of the body covered by the breastplate, the thorax.] 1. In anat. and zoöl., a part of the trunk between the head or neck and the abdomen or tail, in any way distinguished, as by containing the heart and lungs, by being inclosed with large ribs, or by bearing certain limbs not borne elsewhere. The name is applied both to the walls and to the cavity of this part of the body, but not to the contents of the cavity, and properly not to the thoracic appendages. In all vertebrates the thorax represents several of the segments or somites of the body succeeding the cervical and succeeded by the abdominal or pelvic segments. It is generally defined by the elongation of several ribs and the connection of some or most of these with a breast-bone, the thoracic skeleton thus forming a bony cage or frame which contains and defends the principal organs of circulation and respiration. In invertebrates, however, the thorax is defined upon other considerations. (a) In man and all mammals the thorax is sharply marked off from the rest of the trunk by the lack of developed cervical and lumbar ribs, and its cavity is completely shut off from that of the abdomen by the diaphragm. The human thorax is of conical figure, somewhat like the frustum of a cone, narrowed above, broad below, of greater width than depth, and in cross section somewhat cardiform or heart-shaped, from the intrusion of the backbone. Its truncated apex presents to the neck; its concave base is formed by the diaphragm. The cavity is divided into a pair of large pleural cavities, right and left, for the lungs, and a third submedian pericardial cavity for the heart. Where the opposite pleural cavities do not quite meet and fit, both before and behind, is an interpleural space, the anterior and posterior mediastinal cavity, or premediastinum and post-mediastinum. Besides the heart and lungs and their respective serous sacs (pericardium and pleura), the thorax contains many other structures, as the thoracic duct and thoracic aorta, many branches of the latter, etc. The thorax of other mammals differs from that of man chiefly in size, shape, degree of movability, etc., but not in actual structure or office. (b) In birds the thorax is relatively very capacious and expansive. The sternum is of enormous size; long ribs frequently extend into the sacral region, and others, shorter, into the cervical region, so that the thorax encroaches in both directions. Its cavity is not shut off from that of the abdomen by any diaphragm. The ribs have a movable joint between their vertebral and sternal parts, contributing to the expansibility of the chest. Most of the abdominal as well as proper thoracic viscera are actually inclosed by the thoracic walls. See cut under epipleura. (c) In those reptiles and batrachians which have breast-bones a thorax is distinguished much as it is in higher vertebrates. In serpents, which have no sternum, and whose ribs extend from head to tail, there is no distinction between thorax and abdomen, and the case is similar with turtles. In a few reptiles the thorax develops wing-like parachutes serving for a kind of flight. (d) In fishes a thorax, or a thoracabdominal region, is usually well marked by long ribs from a prosanal solid and fleshy part of the body, but there is no distinction of thoracic and abdominal cavities. The thorax may bear the pectoral fins, or these and the ventrals, or neither.

Cross-section of Human Chest viewed from above, showing heart, lungs, and great vessels in place. Each lung is invested with pleura and the heart with pericardium: the dark borders around the lungs and heart are cavities of pleura and of pericardium; the interval between pleural cavities of opposite sides is the mediastinum; the anterior mediastinum is entirely black; the middle is occupied by the heart, the posterior by the esophagus, etc.

2. In entom., that part of the body which is situated between the head and the abdomen, and in adult insects alone bears the wings and legs, when there are any. In the typical or hexapod insects the thorax is almost always a well-marked region, distinguished from the head in front and from the abdomen behind by bearing the only locomotory appendages which these insects possess in the adult state—namely, one or two pairs of wings and three pairs of legs. The thorax typically consists of three segments or somites of the body, one to each pair of legs, respectively named, from before backward, the prothorax, the mesothorax, and the metathorax, or sometimes the prethorax, medithorax, and post-thorax. The hard crust of each of these segments may and normally does consist of a number of pieces or individual sclerites, on the dorsal or tergal, on the lateral or pleural, and on the ventral or sternal aspects. These sclerites are known as tergites, pleurites, and sternites; they have also other names, and many of the individual sclerites have specific designations. Thus, dorsal sclerites or parts of each segment may be known as pronotum, mesonotum, and metanotum, and so with pleural and sternal sclerites of each thoracic segment. (See sclerite, and cuts under mesothorax and metathorax.) In ordinary descriptive entomology the name thorax has two special restrictions: (1) to the pronotum of coleopterous, hemipterous, and orthopterous insects; and (2) to the large mesothorax of dipterous insects (see thoraciform).

3. In Crustacea and Arachnida, a part of the body in advance of and in any way distinguished from the abdomen or tail, but usually blended with the head to form a cephalothorax. In ordinary arachnidans, as spiders, and in the higher crustaceans, as crabs, lobsters, shrimps, prawns, and crawfishes, several segments of the body are more or less completely fused in one mass; and the limbs are often so gradually metamorphosed into mouth-parts that even these indicia fail to discriminate a thorax from the head in every case. Generally, however, the bearing of eight or ten legs, developed as ambulatory organs, serves to denote a thorax. In many or most of the lower or entomostracous crustaceans a thorax is indistinguishable from the abdomen as well as from the head, and the character of its appendages does not always decide the case. See Decapoda, Tetradecapoda, Thoracipoda, thoracetron.

4. A breastplate, cuirass, or corselet; more especially, the cuirass or corselet worn by the ancient Greek warriors, corresponding to the lorica of the Romans. It consisted of a breastplate and a backpiece fastened by buckles, and was often richly ornamented.—Cornute, dimerous, isthmiate thorax. See the adjectives.—Rectus thoracis. See rectus.—Transversus thoracis. Same as sternocostalis.

thoret, adv. An obsolete form of there.

Thoresdayt, n. A Middle English form of Thursday.

Thoresenet, n. [ME., < Thores, Thor's (see Thursday), + ene, even: see even[2].] The eve of Holy Thursday (Ascension day).

Hii by gonne an holy Thoresene, then toun asaly þere Stalwardlyche ȝ vaste ynou, noblemen is tht were.
Rob. of Gloucester, p. 394 (quoted in Hampson, Medii Ævi Kalendarium, II. 374).

★thoria (thō′ri-ạ), n. [NL., < Thor.] An oxid of thorium, ThO_2. When pure it is a white powder, without taste, smell, or alkaline reaction on litmus. Its specific gravity is 10.22. Nearly insoluble in all acids except sulphuric. Used in the mantles of Welsbach lamps.

thoric (thō′rik), a. [< thorium + -ic.] Of or pertaining to, or derived from, thorium.

thorina (thō-rī′nạ), n. [NL., < Thor + -ina[1].] Same as thoria.

thorinum (thō-rī′num), n. [NL., < Thor + -in-um.] Same as thorium.

thorite (thō′rīt), n. [< thor(ium) + -ite[2].] A silicate of thorium, generally compact with conchoidal fracture, and of a black color, or, as in the variety orangite, orange-yellow. It is found in Norway in considerable quantity, especially in the neighborhood of Arendal. As found it always contains water, but the original mineral was doubtless anhydrous, and isomorphous with the zirconium silicate zircon. Some varieties of the mineral, called uranothorite, contain a ★considerable amount of uranium.

thorium (thō′ri-um), n. [NL., < Thor + -ium.] Chemical symbol, Th; atomic weight, 232.42. The metallic base of the earth thoria, discovered by Berzelius, in 1828, in a mineral from Norway, to which the name of thorite is now given, and which consists essentially of the silicate of thorium. It has also been found in other rare minerals. The metal thorium, as artificially prepared, resembles nickel in color, has a specific gravity of 11.10 to 11.23, takes fire when heated in the air, and burns with a bright flame; it dissolves readily in hydrochloric acid, but with difficulty in nitric acid. Its chemical relations place it in the same group with tin. See the supplement.

thorlt, v. An obsolete form of thirl[1].

thorn[1] (thôrn), n. [< ME. thorn, < AS. thorn = ★OS. OFries. thorn = D. doorn = MLG. dorn = OHG. MHG. G. dorn = Icel. thorn = Sw. torn = Dan. torn, tjörn = Goth. thaurnus, thorn, = OBulg. trŭnŭ = Serv. Bohem. trn = Pol. tarn, a thorn, = Russ. ternŭ, the blackthorn; cf. Skt. tarna, a blade of grass.] 1. A sharp excrescence on a plant: usually a branch, or the termination of a stem or branch, indurated, leafless, and attenuated to a point; a spine; a prickle. See spine, 1.

O thin heaued wes set te crune of scharpe thornes, that with eauriche thorn wrang ut te reade blod of thin heali heaued. Wooing of Our Lord (Morris and Skeat, I. 127).

But ne're the rose without the thorn.
Herrick, The Rose.

2. Figuratively, that which wounds or annoys; a cause of discomfort or irritation; a painful circumstance.

I am amazed, methinks, and lose my way
Among the thorns and dangers of this world.
Shak., K. John, iv. 3. 141.

3. One of numerous thorny shrubs or trees, especially the members of the genus Cratægus, otherwise called haw. These are low trees or shrubs with abundant white blossoms, and small apple-like fruit

Flowering Branch of Washington Thorn (Cratægus cordata). a, the fruit; b, leaf, showing the nervation.

sometimes edible. The wood is hard and close-grained—in some species, as the hawthorn, useful for turnery and even for wood-engraving. Several acacias and various other plants receive the name. See hawthorn, and specific names below.

The rose also mid hire rude [redness],
That cumeth ut of the thorne wude.
Owl and Nightingale, l. 444 (Morris and Skeat, I. 183).

All about the thorn will blow
In tufts of rosy-tinted snow.
Tennyson, Two Voices.

4. In zoöl., some sharp process, horn, or spine. See spine, 3.—5. In entom., one of certain geometrid moths: an English book-name. The little thorn is Epione advenaria; the early thorn is Selenia illunaria.—6. In lace-making, a small pointed projection used to decorate the cordon-net, etc. Compare spine, 5.—7. The Anglo-Saxon letter þ, equivalent to th; also, the corresponding character in Icelandic.

The English letter thorn, þ, survived and continued in use down to the 15th century, when it was transformed to y. Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 160.

A thorn in the flesh or side, a source of constant annoyance.

There was given to me a thorn [or stake, R. V., margin] in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure. 2 Cor. xii. 7.

Buffalo-thorn, Acacia Latronum, of India, a low tree with an umbrella-like top when old, and bearing long prickles.—Christ's thorn. See Christ's-thorn, Paliurus, and nebbuk-tree. In Germany the holly is said to be the Christ's-thorn.—Cockspur-thorn, the American Cratægus Crus-galli, also called Newcastle thorn. It reaches the height of 80 feet, is of a table-like growth, and has dark shining leaves, and thorns 4 inches long. It is planted for ornament in Europe, being perhaps the best American species for the purpose, as it is also for hedging.—Egyptian thorn, Acacia scorpioides, one of the gum-arabic trees.—Elephant-thorn, Acacia tomentosa.—Evergreen thorn, the pyracanth, Cotoneaster Pyracantha, of southern Europe. It is a favorite in culture for its luxuriant evergreen foliage and abundant orange-scarlet fruit. Being of a spreading and trailing habit, it is in England often trained upon walls.—Glastonbury thorn, a variety of hawthorn, a form of Cratægus Oxyacantha, which puts forth leaves and flowers about Christmas. This variety is said to have originated at Glastonbury Abbey, England, and it was believed that the original tree was the staff with which Joseph of Arimathea aided his steps on his wanderings from the Holy Land to Glastonbury, where, according to tradition, he became the founder of the celebrated abbey.—Jerusalem thorn. See Parkinsonia.—Jews' thorn. Same as Christ's-thorn.—Karoo thorn, the karoo doorn or doorn boom of South Africa, Acacia horrida, a tree with very sharp spines from ½ inch to 3 inches long.—Lily thorn, a plant of the West Indian rubiaceous genus Catesbæa, particularly C. spinosa with large yellow nodding flowers, and C. parviflora with small white flowers. These plants are spiny in the axils of the leaves.—Newcastle thorn. See cockspur-thorn, above.—Parsley-leafed thorn, the parsley-haw, Cratægus apiifolia, of the southern United States.—Pear-thorn. Same as pear-haw (see haw[2], 3).—Pyracanth thorn, the evergreen thorn.—Sallow-thorn. See Hippophaë.—Scarlet-fruited thorn, the scarlet or red haw, Cratægus coccinea, a small tree common northward in North America, with finely cut-toothed leaves and small scarlet, barely edible haws.—Scorpion-thorn, scorpion's thorn. Same as scorpion-plant, 2.—September thorn. See September.—Silkworm-thorn, a small Chinese tree, Cudrania triloba, of the nettle family. Its leaves are considered as good as those of the mulberry for silkworms, but are more difficult to gather on account of thorns.—Thirsty thorn, Acacia Seyal.—Wait-a-bit thorn, the grapple-plant.—Washington thorn, Cratægus cordata, found in Virginia, and thence southward and westward. It was formerly widely planted for hedges, being disseminated from near Washington city. See cut above.—Waythorn, the buckthorn, Rhamnus catharticus: so called as springing up along highways. [Prov. Eng.]—White thorn. (a) In England, the common hawthorn: so called from its lighter bark in contrast with the sloe or blackthorn. (b) In the United States, sometimes, the scarlet-fruited thorn. (c) See Macrocnemum.—Willow-thorn. Same as sallow-thorn. (See also blackthorn, buckthorn, camel's-thorn, mouse-thorn, orange-thorn.) thorn[1] (thôrn), v. t. [< thorn[1], n.] 1. To prick or pierce with or as with a thorn. [Rare.]

I am the only rose of all the stock
That never thorn'd him.
Tennyson, Harold, i. 1.

2. To fasten with a thorn.

Somtimes the Plane, somtimes the Vine they shear,
Choosing their fairest tresses heer and there;
And with their sundry locks, thorn'd each to other,
Their tender limbs they hide from Cynthias Brother.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Handy-Crafts.

thorn[2]† (thôrn), a. [Origin obscure.] Supplied (?).

Ye'll eat and drink, my merry men a',
An' see ye be weell thorn.
Sir Patrick Spens (Child's Ballads, III. 339).

thorn[2]†, v. i. [< thorn[2], a.] To be supplied (?).

When they had eaten and well drunken,
And a' had thorn'd fine;
The bride's father he took the cup,
For to serve out the wine.
Sweet Willie and Fair Maisry (Child's Ballads, II. 335).

thorn-apple (thôrn′ap′l), n. 1. A plant of the genus Datura, chiefly D. Stramonium. The name refers to the large spiny capsule. See stramonium.—2. A fruit of some species of Cratægus or thorn-tree; a haw; ★also, the tree itself.

thornback (thôrn′bak), n. [< ME. thornbak, thornbake; < thorn[1] + back[1].] 1. A kind of ray or skate, Raia clavata, common on the British coasts, distinguished by the short and strong spines which are scattered over the back and tail. It grows about 2 feet long, and is very voracious, feeding on small flounders, herrings, sandeels, crabs, lobsters, etc. Many are taken every year, and the flesh is considered to be excellent. The female is in Scotland called maiden-skate.

Thornback (Raia clavata).

The spreading ray, the thornback thin and flat.
J. Dennys (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 166).

thornback-ray (thôrn′bak-rā), n. Same as thornback, 1.

thornbill (thôrn′bil), n. A humming-bird of the genus Rhamphomicron: a book-name. These notable hummers are large (averaging over four inches long), with broad forked tail, the gorget pendent like a beard, and specially short sharp bill (whence both the generic and vernacular names). Six species are described, one of the best-known being R. heteropogon. They range from the Colombian States through Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia. The genus has three synonyms—Chalcostigma, Lampropogon, and Eupogonus.

Thornbill (Rhamphomicron heteropogon).

thorn-bird (thôrn′bėrd), n. A South American dendrocolaptine bird, originally Furnarius anumbi (Vieillot, after Azara), now Anumbius acuticaudatus (and rarely Sphenopyga anumbi).

Thorn-bird (Anumbius acuticaudatus).

It is about 8 inches long, brown varied with black, white, and chestnut, and noted for the great size of the nest which it builds, of twigs and thorns, in bushes. It is a well-known Argentine type, a sort of large synallaxine bird with short wings, stout feet, and sharp tail-feathers.

thorn-broom (thôrn′bröm), n. The furze, Ulex Europæus.

thorn-bush (thôrn′bůsh), n. A shrub that produces thorns.

The lanthorn is the moon; I, the man in the moon; this thorn-bush, my thorn-bush. Shak., M. N. D., v. 1. 263.

thorn-devil (thôrn′dev″l), n. A certain spiny lizard, Moloch horridus.

Thorn-devil (Moloch horridus).

thorned (thôrnd), a. [< thorn[1] + -ed[2].] Bearing thorns; thorny.

Silvery-green with thorned vegetation, sprawling lobes of the prickly pear. The Atlantic, LXV. 207.

thorn-hopper (thôrn′hop″ėr), n. A tree-hopper, Thelia cratægi, which lives on the thorn and other rosaceous trees.

thorn-house (thôrn′hous), n. A salt-evaporating house in which the brine is caused to trickle down over piles of brush or thorns, in order to give greater exposure for evaporation.

thornless (thôrn′les), a. [< thorn[1] + -less.] Free from thorns.

Youth's gay prime and thornless paths.
Coleridge, Sonnet to Bowles.

Thy great Forefathers of the thornless garden, there Shadowing the snow-limb'd Eve.
Tennyson, Maud, xviii. 3.

thorn-oyster (thôrn′ois″tėr), n. A thorny bivalve of the family Spondylidæ. See cut under Spondylus.

thornstone (thôrn′stōn), n. In the manufacture of salt, a concretion of carbonates of lime, magnesia, manganese, and iron, and some chlorids, which accumulates in the thorns of a thorn-house.

thorn-swine (thôrn′swīn), n. A porcupine.

thorntail (thôrn′tāl), n. [< thorn[1] + tail[1].] A humming-bird of the genus Gouldia, having long sharp tail-feathers (whence the genus is also called Prymnacantha). The one with the most spine-like rectrices is G. popelairei, 4½ inches long, the male of a shining grass-green color, varied in some places with red, steel-blue, black, and white. It inhabits the United States of Colombia, Ecuador, and Peru.

thorn-tailed (thôrn′tāld), a. In herpet., having spinose scales on the tail: specific in the phrase thorn-tailed agamas. See Uromastix.

thorny (thôr′ni), a. [< ME. thorny = D. doornig = MHG. dornic, G. dornig; as thorn[1] + -y[1]. The AS. form is thorniht = G. dornicht.] 1. Abounding in or covered with thorns; producing thorns; prickly; spiny.

The steep and thorny way to heaven.
Shak., Hamlet, i. 3. 48.

And the thorny balls, each three in one,
The chestnuts throw on our path.
Browning, By the Fireside.

2. Characteristic of or resembling a thorn; sharp; irritating; painful.

The sharp thorny points
Of my alleged reasons drive this forward.
Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 4. 224.

A sharp thorny-toothed satirical rascal.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, iv. 1.

3. In zoöl., spinous; prickly; echinate.—Thorny lobster, the spiny lobster. See cut under Palinurus.—Thorny oyster. Same as thorn-oyster.=Syn. 1. Spinose, ★spinous, briery, sharp.

thorogummite (thō-rō-gum′īt), n. [< thorium + gummite.] A mineral occurring in massive forms of a dull yellowish-brown color, and containing silica and the oxids of uranium, thorium, and the metals of the cerium and yttrium groups. It is somewhat related to gummite, but is distinguished by containing thorium. It occurs with gadolinite and other rare minerals in Llano county, Texas.

thorough (thur′ō), prep. and adv. [Early mod. E. also thorow; often written briefly thoro'; < ME. thorouz, thorou, thoruz, thoruh, thoru, thorw, thorz, thuregh, thurez, thuruh, thourh, thurgh, thurgh, thurch, thurth, thurh, < AS. thurh, rarely and chiefly in comp. thyrh, therh, ONorth. therh = OS. thurh, thuru = OFries. thruch, truch, Fries. troch, also dör = MD. deur, door, D. door = MLG. durch, dor = OHG. duruh, dhurah, durih, MHG. durch, dur, G. durch = Goth. thairh, thorough, through; orig., as the AS. (ONorth.) and Goth. forms indicate, with radical e (AS. therh, > theorh*, > thurh); prob. orig. neut. acc. ('going through') of the adj. appearing in OHG. derh, 'pierced,' whence also ult. AS. dim. thyrel (thyrhel*) (= OHG. durhil, durihil, etc.), pierced, as a noun, thyrel, a hole (see thirl[1], n.), and Goth. thairko, a hole (see thirl[1], and cf. thurrock); perhaps ult. connected with AS. thringan, etc., press, crowd (press through): see thring, throng[1]. Hence, by transposition, through[1], the common modern form, differentiated from thorough as prep. and adv. For the form thorough, < AS. thurh, cf. borough[1], < AS. burh, and furrow, < AS. furh.] I. prep. Through. See through[1], a later form of thorough, now the exclusive form as a preposition and adverb.

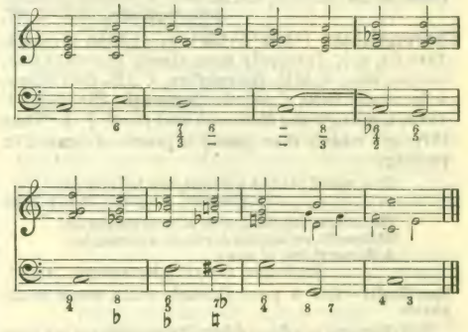
thorough (thur′ō), n. [< thorough, a. or adv.] 1. That which goes through. Specifically—(a†) A thoroughfare; a passage; a channel.



If any man would alter the natural course of any water to run a contrary way, . . . the alteration must be from the head, by making other thoroughs and devices.
J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc.), I. 303. (Davies.)

(b) A furrow between two ridges. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.] (c) Same as perpend[3].

2. In Brit. hist., in the reign of Charles I., the policy of Strafford and Laud of conducting or carrying through ('thorough') the administration of public affairs without regard to obstacles. Hence the word is associated with their system of tyranny.

The dark, gloomy countenance, the full, heavy eye, which meet us in Strafford's portrait, are the best commentary on his policy of Thorough.
J. R. Green, Short Hist. Eng., p. 509.

thorough-bass (thur′ō-bās), n. 1. In music, a figured bass, or basso continuo—that is, a bass voice-part written out in full throughout an entire piece, and accompanied by numerals which indicate stenographically the successive chords of the harmony.—2. A system of stenographic marks, especially numerals, thus used with a bass for the purpose of indicating the harmony.—3. The science or art of harmonic composition in general: so called because of the prevalence of such stenographic systems: a loose usage. The ordinary system of thorough-bass, that of numerals, appears first in a publication of Richard Dering in 1597, and its earliest systematic presentation was by Viadana in 1612. In this system numerals are used to indicate the intervals between each tone of the given bass and the constituent tones of the chord to which it belongs so far as is necessary for clearness. If the bass tone is the root of a triad, no numeral is used, unless, perhaps, in an opening chord, to mark the desired position of the soprano, or where a previous chord might occasion ambiguity. The first inversion of a triad is indicated either by $\frac{6}{3}$ or simply by 6; the second inversion by $\frac{6}{4}$. A seventh-chord is marked by 7; its first inversion by $\frac{6}{5}$ or by $\frac{6}{5}$; its second inversion by $\frac{6}{3}$ or by $\frac{4}{3}$; and its third inversion by $\frac{6}{2}$, $\frac{4}{2}$, or simply 2. A chord of the ninth is marked 9, etc. A suspension is indicated by a numeral corresponding to its interval from the bass, followed usually by a careful noting of the interval of the resolution. In two successive chords having tones in common that are held over from one to the other in the same voices, the numerals required to indicate them in the first chord are given, and are followed in the second by dashes to mark their continuance. Every chromatic deviation from the original tonality is indicated. If the deviation occurs in a tone a third above the bass, a ♯, ♭, or ♮ is generally used alone; but if it affects a tone already indicated by a numeral, the accidental required is prefixed to the numeral, except that, in place of a ♯ thus prefixed, it is customary to use a dash drawn through the numeral itself (as 6 or 4). A passage that is to be performed without chords—that is, in unison or in octaves—is marked tasto solo, or t. s. It is practically possible to indicate in these ways every element in the most complicated harmonic writing, so that an entire accompaniment may be presented on a single staff. The interpretation of such a score requires a thorough knowledge of the principles of part-writing. In consequence of the wide-spread use of this system, the first inversion of a triad is often colloquially called a six-chord, the second inversion a six-four chord, etc.

thorough-bolt (thur′ō-bōlt), n. In mech., a bolt that passes through a hole and is secured in place by a nut screwed upon its projecting end: distinguished from a tap-bolt.

thoroughboret, v. t. [ME. thorouboren (= OHG. durhporōn, MHG. durchborn, G. durchbohren); < thorough + bore[1].] To bore through; perforate. R. Manning, Hist. of England (ed. Furnivall), l. 16184.

thorough-brace (thur′ō-brās), n. A strong band of leather extending from the front C-spring to the back one, and supporting the body of a coach or other vehicle. E. H. Knight.

thorough-braced (thur′ō-brāst), a. Provided with or supported by thorough-braces.

The old-fashioned thorough-braced wagon.
S. O. Jewett, Country Doctor, p. 19.

thoroughbred (thur′ō-bred), a. and n. [Also throughbred; < thorough + bred.] I. a. 1. Of pure or unmixed breed, stock, or race; bred from a sire and dam of the purest or best blood. See II.

Many young gentlemen canter up on thorough-bred hacks, spatter-dashed to the knee.
Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xlv.

Hence—2. Having the qualities characteristic of pure breeding; high-spirited; mettlesome; elegant or graceful in form or bearing: sometimes applied colloquially to persons.—3. Thoroughgoing; thorough.

Your thoroughbred casuist is apt to be very little of a Christian. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 23, note.

Cushing, scarce a man in years,
But a sailor thoroughbred.
The Century, XXXVIII. 730.

II. n. An animal, especially a horse, of pure blood, stock, or race; strictly, and as noting horses, a race-horse all of whose ancestors for a given number of generations (seven in England, five in America) are recorded in the stud-book.

In America the name is now loosely given to any animal that is of pure blood and recorded pedigree, or is entitled to be recorded in a stud-book, herd-book, or flock-register, and whose ancestry is known and recorded for five generations of dams and six of sires. In the most restricted sense a thoroughbred is the English race-horse, with ancestry recorded in the stud-book; a pure-bred is a similarly bred animal of another breed, with recorded ancestry in herd-books, stud-books, flock-books, or other pedigree-records. Sometimes applied colloquially to persons.

In the [American] "Stud Book," I have laid it down as a rule that to pass a thoroughbred [be entitled to registry in the Stud Book, if a breeding animal] a horse must have at least six pure and known crosses, and for reasons there given have admitted mares one degree short of that standard [that is, six generations for sires, and five for dams].
Wallace, Trotting Register, I. 14.

Horse for horse, a thoroughbred is an animal of more endurance and swiftness than a halfbred; he is as fine a fencer as any halfbred, and his pace is certainly greater.
Edinburgh Rev., CLXVI. 407.

thoroughfare (thur'ō-fār), n. [Also throughfare (q. v.); formerly sometimes thoroughfair, thorowfair; < ME. thurghfare, < AS. thurhfaru, a thoroughfare, < thurh, thorough, through, + faru, a going: see thorough and fare[1].] 1. That through which one goes; a place of travel or passage.

This world nis but a thurghfare ful of wo.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1989.

The courts are fill'd with a tumultuous din
Of crowds, or issuing forth, or ent'ring in;
A thoroughfare of news.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., xii. 79.

Specifically—(a†) A place through which much traffic passes.

O thou! bold leader of the Trojan bands,
And you, confed'rate chiefs from foreign lands!
Pope, Iliad, xii. 69.

In ordinary English use the place of thou has been taken by you, which is properly plural, and takes a plural verb. Thou is now little used except archaically, in poetry, provincially, in addressing the Deity, and by the Friends, who usually say not thou but thee, putting a verb in the third person singular with it: as, thee is or is thee?

O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come.
Ps. lxv. 2.

The priest asked me, "Why we said Thou and Thee to people? for he counted us but fools and idiots for speaking so." I asked him "Whether those that translated the scriptures, and made the grammar and accidence, were fools and idiots, seeing they translated the scriptures so, and made the grammar so, Thou to one, and You to more than one, and left it so to us?" George Fox, Journal, 1665.

And if thou marries a good un I'll leäve the land to thee.
Tennyson, Northern Farmer, N. S.

Formerly it was used in general address, and often bore special significance, according to circumstances as noting —(a) equality, familiarity, or intimacy; (b) superiority on the part of the speaker; (c) contempt or scorn for the person addressed (see thou, v.).

Thazles the wone is kueaduol, and may wel wende to zenne dyadlich. Ayenbite of Inwyt (E. E. T. S.), p. 6.

thought[1] (thât), n. [< ME. thought, thouht, thoht, thozt, thuzt, ithozt, < AS. gethōht, also theaht, getheaht = OS. githâht, f., thinking, belief, = D. gedachte = OHG. daht*, MHG. dâht, f., thought, OHG. gedâht (cf. OHG. anadâht, MHG. andâht, G. andacht, attention, devotion (= Goth. andathahts, attention), G. bedacht, deliberation) = Icel. thōtti, thōttr, thought, = Goth. thuhtus, thought (the above forms being more or less confused); with formative -t or -tu, < AS. thencan (pret. thōhte), etc., think: see think[1].] 1. The process or the product of thinking. The word thought is used very loosely in current psychology. Strictly defined, thought is the final and most complex term in the series of mental formations based upon sensation; the series which rises through perception and idea to the association of ideas, judgment, etc. Thought is always carried on in verbal ideas; always implies active attention; and is accompanied by and resolved upon one or other of the intellectual sentiments (difficulty, obscurity, curiosity, agreement, etc.). It is the counterpart of active imagination, and forms the subject-matter of logic, as imagination forms that of esthetics. (a) In the most concrete sense, a single step in a process of thinking; an idea; a notion; a reflection.

"They are never alone," said I, "that are accompanied with noble thoughts." Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, i.

Truth shall nurse her,
Holy and heavenly thoughts still counsel her.
Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 5. 30.

Some to Conceit alone their taste confine,
And glittering thoughts struck out at every line.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 290.

To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.
Wordsworth, Ode, Immortality.

(b) The condition or state of a person during such mental process.

Horn sat upon the grunde,
In thuzte he was ibunde.
King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 32.

Sir Bedivere . . . paced beside the mere,
Counting the dewy pebbles, fix'd in thought.
Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

(c) A synonym of cognition in the common threefold division of modes of consciousness: from the fact that thought, loosely used as above described, embraces every intellectual process from the bare sensation to the highest elaborations of constructive reasoning.

Feeling, thought, and action are to a certain extent opposed or mutually exclusive states of mind.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 657.

(d) The objective aspect of the intellectual process.

Thought always proceeds from the less to the more determinate, and, in doing so, it cannot determine any object positively without determining it negatively, or determine it negatively without determining it positively.
E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 313.

Thought is, in every case, the cognition of an object, which really, actually existentially out of thought, is ideally, intellectually, intelligibly within it; and just because within in the latter sense, is it known as actually without in the former. Mind, No. 35, July, 1884.

(e) A judgment or mental proposition, in which form the concept always appears.

Thought proper, as distinguished from other facts of consciousness, may be adequately described as the act of knowing or judging things by means of concepts.
Dean Mansel, Prolegomena to Logic, p. 22.

(f) An argument, inference, or process of reasoning, by which process the concept is always produced.

Without entering upon the speculations of the Nominalists and the Realists, we must admit that, in the process of ratiocination, properly called thought, the mind acts only by words. G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., i.

(g) An intellectual standpoint, considered as something which, under the influence of experience, has a development of its own, more or less independent of individual caprices, and that (1) in the life of an individual, and (2) in history: as, the gradual development of Greek thought.

(h) The subjective aspect of the intellectual process; thinking as known by introspection.

By the word thought I understand all that which so takes place in us that we of ourselves are immediately conscious of it. Descartes, Prin. of Philos. (tr. by Veitch), i. § 9.

(i) The understanding; intellect.

For our instruction, to impart Things above earthly thought. Milton, P. L., vii. 82.

What never was seen or heard of may yet be conceived; nor is anything beyond the power of thought except what implies an absolute contradiction.
Hume, Inquiry concerning Human Understanding, ii.

2. An intention; a design; a purpose; also, a half-formed determination or expectation with reference to future action: with of: as, I have some thought of going to Europe.

They have not only thoughts of repentance, but general purposes of doing the acts of it at one time or other.
Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. iii.

The sun was very low when we came to this place, and we had some thoughts of staying there all night; but the people gave us no great encouragement.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 106.

3. pl. A particular frame of mind; a mood or temper.

I would not there reside,
To put my father in impatient thoughts
By being in his eye. Shak., Othello, i. 3. 243.

It glads me
To find your thoughts so even.
B. Jonson, Catiline, iii. 1.

4†. Doubt; perplexity.

Whan the lordes vndirstod that kynge Arthur was gon and lefte his londe, than thei hadde grete thought wherefore it myght be; but no wise cowde thei devise the cause.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 176.

5. Care; trouble; anxiety; grief.

There is another thynge . . .
Which cause is of my deth for sorwe and thought.
Chaucer, Troilus, l. 579.

In this thought and this anguyssh was the mayden by the coniurison of Merlin. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 608.

Take no thought [be not anxious, R. V.] for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink. Mat. vi. 25.

Gonzales was done to death by Gasca. Soto died of thought in Florida; and ciuill wars eate vp the rest in Peru. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 871.

6. A slight degree; a fraction; a trifle; a little: used in the adverbial phrase a thought: as, a thought too small.

Here be they are every way as fair as she, and a thought fairer, I trow. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iv. 1.

Though I now totter, yet I think I am a thought better.
Swift, Letter, Aug. 12, 1727.

Elemental law of thought. See elemental.— Free thought. See free.— New Thought. See new.— Objective thought. See objective reason, under objective.— Second thoughts, maturer or calmer reflection; after-consideration: as, on second thoughts, I will not speak of it.

Is it so true that second thoughts are best?
Not first, and third, which are a riper first?
Tennyson, Sea Dreams.

Upon or with a thought, with the speed of thought; in a twinkling; immediately.

The fit is momentary; upon a thought
He will again be well. Shak., Macbeth, iii. 4. 55.

I will be here again, even with a thought.
Shak., J. C., v. 3. 19.

What is my thought like? a game in which one or more of the players think of a certain object, and the rest, through questions as to what that thought or object is like, try to guess it.=Syn. 1. (a) Feeling, etc. (see sentiment); imagination, supposition.

thought[2] (thât). Preterit and past participle of think[1].

thought[3] (thât). Preterit of think[2].

thrall (thrâl), n. and a. [< ME. thral, thralle, threl, threlle (pl. thralles, thrales, threlles, threles), < late AS. thrǣl (pl. thrǣlas), < Icel. thrœll = Sw. träl = Dan. træl, a thrall, prob. = OHG. dregil, drigil, trigil, trikil, a serf, thrall; Teut. form thragila* (contracted in Scand.), perhaps orig. 'a runner,' hence an attendant, servant; < AS. thrægian (= Goth. thragjan), run, < thrag, thrah, a running, course; cf. Gr. τροχίλος, a small bird said to be attendant on the crocodile, < τρόχος, a running, < τρέχειν, run (see trochil, trochus, etc.). The notion that thrall is connected with thrill[1], as if meaning orig. 'thrilled'—i. e. 'one whose ears have been thrilled or drilled in token of servitude'—is ridiculous in theory and erroneous in fact. The AS. thrǣl, thrall, cannot be derived from thyrelian, thyrlian, thirl (see thirl[1], thrill[1]), and if it were so derived, it could not mean 'thrilled,' or 'a thrilled man.'] I. n. 1. A slave; a serf; a bondman; a captive.

And se thi sone that in seruage
For mannis soule was made a thralle.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 1.

In a dungeon deepe huge nombers lay
Of caytive wretched thralls, that wayled night and day.
Spenser, F. Q., I. v. 45.

The actual slave, the thrall, the theow, is found everywhere [in early Britain]. The class is formed and recruited in two ways. The captive taken in war accepts slavery as a lighter doom than death; the freeman who is guilty of certain crimes is degraded to the state of slavery by sentence of law. In either case the servile condition of the parent is inherited by his children.
E. A. Freeman, Encyc. Brit., VIII. 274.

The thrall in person may be free in soul.
Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

2. One who is a slave to some desire, appetite, spell, or other influence; one who is in moral bondage.

Hi ne byeth [they are not] threlles ne to gold ne to zeluer, ne to hare caroyne [their flesh], ne to the guodes of fortune.
Ayenbite of Inwyt (E. E. T. S.), p. 86.

The slaves of drink and thralls of sleep.
Shak., Macbeth, iii. 6. 13.

3. Thraldom, literal or figurative; bondage; slavery; subjection.

The chafed Horse, such thrall ill-suffering,
Begins to snuff, and snort, and leap, and fling.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Handy-Crafts.

Now soon they reach Newcastle jail,
And to the pris'ner thus they call;
"Sleips thou, wakes thou, Jock o' the Side,
Or is thou wearied o' thy thrall?"
Jock o' the Side (Child's Ballads, VI. 84).

I saw pale kings and princes too; . . .
They cried — "La Belle Dame sans Merci Hath thee in thrall!"
Keats, La Belle Dame sans Merci.

4. A shelf or stand; a stand for barrels. [Prov. Eng.]

thrashel, n. See threshel.

thrasher[1], n. See thresher[1].

thrasher[2] (thrash'ėr), n. [Also thresher; a var. ★of thrusher (appar. simulating thrasher[1], thresher[1]): see thrusher.] A kind of throstle or thrush; specifically, in the United States, a thrush-like bird of the genus Harporhynchus, of which there are numerous species, related to the mocking-bird, and less nearly to the birds commonly called thrushes. The best-known, and the only one found in the greater part of the United States, is H. rufus, the brown thrush or brown thrasher, also called sandy mocking-bird from its color and shape and power of mimicry, in which latter respect it approaches the true mocker, Mimus polyglottus. Its proper song, heard only from the male and in the breeding-season, is loud, rich, skilfully modulated, and well sustained. This bird is very common in shrubbery and undergrowth, especially southward. It is bright rufous above, nearly uniform; below whitish shaded with pale flaxen-brown or cinnamon, and heavily marked with chains of dark-brown streaks, the throat immaculate, with a necklace of oval spots. The length is about 11 inches, the extent only 13 or 14, as the tail is long and the wings are short. It builds in a bush, occasionally on the ground, a bulky nest of twigs, leaves, bark-strips, and rootlets, and lays from four to six eggs, whitish or greenish, profusely speckled with brown, about an inch long and ¾ inch broad. A similar but darker-colored thrasher is H. longirostris of Texas. In New Mexico, Arizona, and California there are several others, showing great variation in the length and curvature of the bill, and quite different in color from the common thrasher. Such are the curve-billed, H. curvirostris; the bow-billed, H. c. palmeri; the Arizona, H. bendirei; the St. Lucas, H. cinereus of Lower California; the California, H. redivivus; the Yuma, H. lecontei; and the crissal, H. crissalis — all found over the Mexican border.

Brown Thrasher (Harporhynchus rufus).

Head of California Thrasher (Harporhynchus redivivus), two thirds natural size.

★thread (thred), n. [Early mod. E. also thred; also threed, whence, with shortened vowel, thrid; < ME. threed, thred, threde, < AS. thrǣd = OFries. thrēd = MD. draed, D. draad = OHG. MHG. drāt, G. draht, thread, wire, = Icel. thrādhr = Sw. tråd = Dan. traad = Goth. thrēths* (not recorded), thread; lit. 'that which is twisted' (cf. twist, twine, thread); with formative -d, < AS. thrāwan, etc., twist, turn: see throw[1].] 1. A twisted filament of a fibrous substance, as cotton, flax, silk, or wool, spun out to considerable length. In a specific sense, thread is a compound cord consisting of two or more yarns firmly united together by twisting. The twisting together of the different strands or yarns to form a thread is effected by a thread-frame, or doubling-and-twisting mill, which accomplishes the purpose by the action of bobbins and fliers. Thread is used in some species of weaving, but its principal use is for sewing. The word is used especially for linen, as distinguished from sewing-silk and sewing-cotton, and as seen in the phrases thread lace and thread glove; but this distinction is not original, and is not always maintained. Compare cuts under spinning-wheel and spinning jenny.

That riche ring ful redily with a red silk threde
The quen bond als bliue a-boute the wolwes necke.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 4430.

Also, cosyn, I pray you to sende me sum Norfoke threde to do a boute my nekke to ryde with. Paston Letters, I. 343.

That its fine thread might answer her neat hand.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, iii. 24.

2. A fine filament or thread-like body of any kind: as, a thread of spun glass; a thread of corn-silk.

Sustaining a threed of Copper, reaching from one to another, on which are fastened many burning Lampes.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 268.

3. The prominent spiral part of a screw. See cuts under screw and screw-thread.—4. In mining, a thin seam, vein, or fissure filled with ore. —5. A very slender line applied on a surface: thus, in decorative art, thin and minute lines are so called to distinguish them from bands of color, which, though narrow, have a more appreciable width.—6. pl. In conch., the byssus.—7. A yarn-measure, the circumference of a reel, containing 1½, 2, 2½, or 3 yards.—8. That which runs through the whole course of something and connects its successive parts; hence, proper course or sequence; the main idea, thought, or purpose which runs through something: as, the thread of a discourse or story.

I would not live over my hours past, or begin again the thread of my days. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. 42.

Wherefore to resume the thread of our course, we were now in sight of the Volcan, being by estimation 7 or 8 leagues from the shoar. Dampier, Voyages, I. 120.

If, after a pause, the grave companion resumes his thread in the following manner, "Well, but to go on with my story," new interruptions come from the left and the right, till he is forced to give over.
Swift, Polite Conversation, Int.

And zuo hit is of the hyeape of huete y-thorsse. The cornes byeth benethe and thet chef a-boue.
Ayenbite of Inwyt (E. E. T. S.), p. 139.

And his son Gideon threshed wheat by the winepress, to hide it from the Midianites. Judges vi. 11.

First thrash the corn, then after burn the straw.
Shak., Tit. And., ii. 3. 123.

2. To beat soundly, as with a stick or whip; drub; hence, to beat in any way: in this sense commonly thrash. [Now colloq.]

Full many wounds in his corrupted flesh
He did engrave; . . . but ale more fresh
And fierce he still appeard, the more he did him thresh.
Spenser, F. Q., III. vii. 32.

I could find a man of a smaller scale
Could thrash the pedlar and also thee.
Bold Pedlar and Robin Hood (Child's Ballads, V. 250).

Do you remember his fight with Ringwood? What an infernal bully he was, and how glad we all were when Brackley thrashed him! Thackeray, Philip, xl.

II. intrans. 1. To practise threshing; beat out grain from straw with a flail or a threshing-machine: in this sense commonly thresh.

Some tyme I sowe and some tyme I thresche.
Piers Plowman (B), v. 553.

2. To beat about; labor; drudge; toil.

I rather would be Mævius, thrash for rhymes
Like his, the scorn and scandal of the times.
Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, x. 194.

3. To throw one's self about; toss to and fro: usually with about: in this sense commonly thrash.

He [a whale] was enveloped in the foam of the sea that his continual and violent thrashing about in the water had created around him. The Century, XL. 518.

thresh[2], n. See thrash[2].

threshel, thrashel (thresh'l, thrash'l), n. [Also thrashle; < ME. threshel*, < AS. therscel, therscol (= OHG. driscil, MHG. G. drischel), a flail, < therscan, thresh: see thresh[1].] An instrument to thresh or thrash with; a flail. [Prov. Eng.]

thresher[1], thrasher[1] (thresh'ėr, thrash'ėr), n. [< ME. threschare, < AS. therscere* (= MD. dorscher = MHG. G. drescher = Sw. törskare = Dan. tærsker), < therscan, thresh: see thresh[1].] 1. One who threshes: in this and the next sense commonly thresher.— 2. A threshing-machine.

The portable and small engines and thrashers . . . were the staple of the Sheaf Works. The Engineer, LXX. 89.

3. A sea-fox; a kind of shark, Alopias vulpes, so called from the enormous length of the upper division of the heterocercal tail, with which it threshes the water. See cut under Alopias. In this sense more commonly thrasher.

About the Islands [Bermudas] are seen many Whales, attended with the Sword-Fish and the Thresher. The Sword-Fish with his Sharp and needle-like Fin [jaw] pricking him into the belly when he would dive and sink into the Sea, and, when he starts up from his woundes, the Thresher with his Club Fins [tail] beats him down again.
Samuel Clarke, Four Chiefest Plantations of the English [in America (1678) (I. Bermuda), p. 27.

4. A member of an Irish Catholic organization instituted in 1806. One of the principal objects was to resist the payment of tithes. Their threats and warnings were signed "Captain Thresher." In this sense only thresher. Imp. Dict.

thresher[2] (thresh'ėr), n. See thrasher[2].

thresher-shark (thresh'ėr-shärk), n. Same as thresher[1], 3. More commonly thrasher-shark.

thresher-whale (thresh'ėr-hwāl), n. A killer, as the common Orca gladiator of the Atlantic. More commonly thrasher-whale.

threshing (thresh'ing), n. The operation by which grain is separated from the straw. This operation is performed in various ways, as by the feet of animals, by a flail, or by a threshing-machine. The first mode was that employed in the ages of antiquity, and it is still practised in the south of Europe and in Persia and India. Also thrashing.

threshing-floor (thresh'ing-flōr), n. A floor or area on which grain is beaten out. In Eastern countries, from the earliest ages, threshing-floors were in the open air; but in colder and moister climates such floors must be under cover, as in a barn. Also thrashing-floor.

He winnoweth barley to night in the threshingfloor.
Ruth iii. 2.

Delve of convenient depth your thrashingfloor;
With tempered clay then fill and face it o'er.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, i. 258.

threshing-machine (thresh'ing-ma-shēn″), n. In agri., a steam-, water-, or horse-power machine which in its most complete form beats the grain from the ears of cereals, separates the grain from the straw, and winnows it from the chaff. Such machines are sometimes fixtures in barns or mills. The more common types are portable, and include straw-carriers or elevators, separators, and winnowing-apparatus in one machine, under the general name of thresher.

Threshing-machine.

a, feed-board; b, cylinder; c, concave or breasting; d, beater; e, straw-rack; f, rock-lever operating straw-rack; g, pitman; h, crank; i, fan; k, conveyer-sieve; l, shoe-sieve; m, casing for grain-auger; n, elevator for receiving grain from the auger and carrying it up to the measuring-apparatus; o, elevator which carries the tailings to the tailing-spout p, which delivers them to the feed-board to be again passed through the cylinder.

The first threshing-machines were made by Hohlfield of Saxony (1711), Menzies of Scotland (1732), and Stirling of Scotland (1758). None of these appear to have been more than experimental. The first practical commercial threshing-machine was made by Meikle of Scotland (1786), and consisted essentially of two parts, a revolving cylinder moving in a breasting, and armed with slats that served as beaters to break the grain from the head, and revolving cylinders armed with rakes that shook the straw to loosen the grain from the broken heads. The grain fell between curved slats or through perforated breasting under the cylinders, and the straw and chaff were thrown out at the end of the machine. These features are retained, though greatly modified, in modern English and American threshing-machines. In American machines the revolving beater with slats has given place to a cylinder armed with radial teeth and moving in a breasting, also armed with teeth, so that the ears are subjected to a tearing and rubbing action. English machines still retain the cylinder with slats. The breasting under the cylinder is a screen through which the larger part of the grain falls as fast as it is loosened from the heads. A variety of separators, agitators, shaking screens, and conveyers have taken the place of the original cylinders with rakes used to separate the grain from the straw, and winnowing-machines, straw-elevators, conveyers, and screening-apparatus have been added, so that now the complete thresher is a complex mill for performing the whole series of operations from the feeding of the grain to the stacking of the straw and the sorting, weighing, and delivery of the grain, chaff, etc. The threshing-machine has been modified so as to adapt it also to clover, flax, and other seeds. See conveyer, elevator, and separator. Also thrashing-machine, thresher, thrasher, threshing-mill.

threshing-mill (thresh'ing-mil), n. Same as threshing-machine.

threshing-place (thresh'ing-plās), n. A threshing-floor. 2 Sam. xxiv. 16.

threshold (thresh'ōld), n. [Early mod. E. also threshould; dial. also throshel, threshfod, Sc. threshwart, threshwort; formerly also trestle (Florio), by confusion with trestle[1], var. threstle, a frame; < ME. threshold*, threshwold, thresshewold, threswold, threswolde, threxwold, threoxwold, thriswald, therswald, threshefold, thressfold, threisshfold, < AS. threscold*, therscold, threscwald, therscwald, theorscwold, threcswald, threoxwold, threxwold, thercswold, therxwold, therxold = MLG. dreskelef, LG. drüssel = OHG. driscūfli, drisgūfli, thriscūfli, driscūvili, thriscūbile, driscūfle, trischūvil, MHG. drischūvel, druschūphel, durschūfel, G. dial. drischäufel, drischibl, drischiwel, trüschhübel, drissufle = Icel. threskjöldr, thresköldr (with numerous variations in inflection), mod. thröskuldr (also threpskjöldr, simulating threp, a ledge) = Sw. tröskel, dial. traskuld = Norw. treskald, treskall, treskjel, treskel = Dan. tærskel, threshold; the variations of form indicate that the terminal element was not understood; it is prob. therefore a somewhat disguised form of a suffix, the formation being prob. < AS. threscan*, therscan, thresh, tread, trample, + -old, corruptly -wold, a transposed form of an old formative -o-thlo-, appearing also as -thol, -thel; the lit. sense being then 'that which is trodden on,' i. e. 'a tread' (cf. tread, the part of a step or stair that is trodden on), therscan, thresh, being taken in the sense 'tread, trample' (as in Goth.). In the common view the second element -wold is supposed to stand for AS. weald, North. wald, wood, and the compound to mean 'a piece of wood trodden on'; but AS. weald does not mean 'wood, timber' (the proper sense being 'a wood, a forest': see wold[1]), and it would not take the form -wold, much less -old, in the AS. period, except by corruption (it is possible, however, that some thought of weald led to the otherwise unexplained alteration of -old to -wold); moreover, the element corresponding to weald does not appear in the other Teut. forms. A third view explains the threshold as orig. "a threshing-floor, because in ancient times the floor at the entrance was used for threshing" (Cleasby and Vigfusson); but the threshing could not have been accomplished on the narrow sills which form thresholds, and it was only in comparatively few houses that threshing was done at all.] 1. The plank, stone, or piece of timber which lies at the bottom of a door, or under it, particularly the door of a dwelling-house, church, temple, or other building; a door-sill; hence, entrance; gate; door.

3. In psychol., the limit below which a given stimulus, or the difference between two stimuli, ceases to be perceptible. Compare schwelle. —Dweller on the threshold. See dweller.—Stimulus threshold. See stimulus.

threshwold†, thresshfold†, n. Middle English forms of threshold.

Threskiornis (thres-ki-ôr'nis), n. [NL. (G. R. Gray, 1841 or 1842), also, by error, Thereschiornis (Brehm, 1855), < Gr. θρησκεία, θρήσκια, worship, < θρησκεύειν, hold in religious awe, venerate, < θρῆσκος, religious, + ὄρνις, bird.] A genus of ibises, or a section of the genus Ibis, based on the sacred ibis of Egypt, commonly called Ibis religiosa, but named T. æthiopicus by Gray, who restricted Ibis itself to certain American forms (after Moehring, 1752). As Moehring is inadmissible in binomial nomenclature, most authors use Ibis for this genus, of which Threskiornis thus becomes a strict synonym. The species named is one of the most famous of birds, venerated by the ancient Egyptians on theological grounds. It is white, with bill, head, and upper part of the neck black, and a large black train of decomposed feathers overrides the tail. This bird is the prototype of the ibis-headed deities frequently represented in Egyptian religious art.

Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xxv.

6. In steam-engines, the movement of a valve, rod, or crank from its central position to its extreme position in either direction. The travel of the element will be twice its throw. —7. In geol., the amount of vertical displacement produced by a fault. Its complementary term is heave, which refers to the horizontal displacement. In older writers and in common speech, 'throw' is sometimes loosely used for 'fault' or 'leap.'

In the Saint Agnes district, however, these traversing veins often contain earthy brown iron ore, and are called "gossans"; and here the displacement is designated a leap—a provincial term used by Mr. Pryce (Mineral. Corn., p. 106), which seems to express the effect as well as any other I have seen. Mr. Carne (Corn. Geol. Trans., ii. p. 119) has introduced the word throw as a synonym. The expressions throw and leap are therefore equivalents, and slide is often used by miners in the same sense.
Henwood, Met. Deposits of Cornwall and Devon (1843), [p. 329.

In the case of an inclined fault, the level of the selected stratum is protracted across the fissure until a vertical from it will reach the level of the same bed. The length of this vertical is the amount of vertical displacement, or the throw of the fault.
Geikie, Text-Book of Geol. (1885), p. 513.

Portugal had some strong and rather coarse thrown silk, besides cocoons. Ure, Dict., IV. 892.

2. Disappointed. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—3. In geol. and mining, moved out of its original position by a fault, or intersecting dike or vein, or fissure of any kind, whether filled with ore, gossan, flucan, or whether simply a crack. The words thrown and heaved are frequently used by miners as meaning the same thing, but properly the former has reference to the amount of vertical, the latter to the horizontal, displacement caused by a fault.

4. Turned. Compare throw[1], v. t., 2.—Thrown singles. See single, 1 (a).—Thrown ware, pottery vessels which have been shaped on the potters' wheel, including most vessels of rounded form, and of all epochs, except the coarsest and most barbarous. Franklin, Autobiog., p. 352.

2. One who throws dice; a gambler.

When Who 's to be in? Who out? was once more the question on every lip, I fancied I could perceive ugly symptoms of the old sores being very likely to break out again, in case a certain bold throwster has swept the pool.
Noctes Ambrosianæ, Sept., 1832.

throw-stick (thrō'stik), n. A missile weapon, consisting of a short club or cudgel, designed to be thrown by being whirled from the hand instead of directly in the line of its length, as in the case of the javelin. The most common form is that of a short club having a heavy ball at one end, usually made of a single piece of hard wood. The boomerang in its different forms also belongs to this order of weapon. See cut under boomerang.

thrugh[1]†, thruch†, thruh†, prep. Middle English forms of through[1].

thrugh[2]†, n. A Middle English form of through[2].

thrum[1] (thrum), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also ★thrumb, thrumme; < ME. thrum, thrumm, a thrum (not found in AS.), = D. drom = OHG. Song-thrush (Turdus musicus).

specifically, the throstle, song-thrush, or mavis of Europe, Turdus musicus. There are more than a hundred species, nearly all of which have book-names in which thrush enters as a qualified term, and the common species of Great Britain and of the United States all have vernacular designations, in which thrush does or does not enter. No thrushes in any sense are common to the two countries named. In the former the dark-colored thrushes are called blackbirds and ouzels. Several true thrushes are figured under blackbird, 1, fieldfare, hermit-thrush, mistle-thrush, ouzel, robin[1], 2, veery, and wood-thrush.

2. Some bird not of the thrush family, mistaken for a thrush or compared to a thrush: with a qualifying epithet. Some are shrikes; others are starlings, warblers, etc. See the phrases following, among which few of the names of other than true thrushes are in other than historical use.—African thrush, an African starling, Amydrus (formerly Turdus or Sturnus) morio, mostly black and orange-chestnut, from 10 to 11 inches long.—Alice's thrush, the gray-cheeked thrush: named thrushil†, n. An obsolete form of thrushel.

thrush-lichen (thrush'lī″ken), n. A lichen, the Peltigera aphthosa, which grows on moist alpine rocks. The Swedes boil it in milk as a cure for thrush (whence the name).

thrush-nightingale (thrush'nī″tin-gāl), n. See nightingale[1], 1.

thrush-paste (thrush'pāst), n. An astringent for curing thrush in the feet of horses. It is composed of calamin, verdigris, white vitriol, alum, and tar.

thrush-tit (thrush'tit), n. A book-name of those turdoid oscine birds of the Himalayan region, Thrush-tit (Cochoa viridis).

China, and Java which belong to a genus named Cochoa by Hodgson in 1836 (changed to Prosorinia by him in 1844, and renamed Xanthogenys by Cabanis in 1850). These birds are neither thrushes nor tits, and are scattered widely through the ornithological system by various taxonomists. The 3 species are very beautiful. C. viridis and C. purpurea (each 11 inches long) inhabit parts of the Himalayas and China; C. azurea (9 inches) inhabits Java. Their coloration is indicated with some accuracy in their respective specific names.

thrust[1] (thrust), v.; pret. and pp. thrust, ppr. thrusting. [< ME. thrusten, but usually thresten, thristen, < Icel. thrȳsta, thrust, press, force, compel; ult. connected with threat, q. v.] I. trans.

1. To push forcibly; shove; force: as, to thrust a hand into one's pocket, or one's feet into slippers; to thrust a stick into the sand: usually followed by from, in, off, away, or other adverb or preposition.

To thrust upon, to force upon; impose or inflict upon.

Some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon 'em. Shak., T. N., ii. 5. 158.

=Syn. 1. Thrust is stronger, more energetic, than push or drive, and represents a more dignified act than shove. No other distinction really exists among these words.

II. intrans. 1. To push or drive with or as with a pointed weapon.

He next his falchion tried in closer fight;
But the keen falchion had no power to bite;
He thrust, the blunted point returned again.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., xii. 643.

They do not thrust with the skill of fencers, but cut up with the barbarity of butchers. Steele, Spectator, No. 422.

2. To push one's self; force a way or passage.

Then he threste thourgh the presse to that Saisne, and for to yeve hym a grete stroke he reysed his ax.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 199.

My fair reputation,
If I thrust into crowds and seek occasions,
Suffers opinion.
Beau. and Fl., Thierry and Theodoret, ii. 3.

Fish . . . thrust up little brooks to spawn.
W. Lauson (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 197).

3. To crowd, or assemble in crowds; press in; throng.

Young, old, thrust there
In mighty concourse.
Chapman, Odyssey. (Johnson.)

4†. To rush; make a dash.

★ As doth an eager hound thrust to a hind. Spenser.

thrust[1] (thrust), n. [< thrust[1], v.] 1. A violent push or drive, as with a pointed weapon pushed in the direction of its length, or with the hand or foot, or with an instrument; a stab; as a term of fence, in general, any attack by a fencer with a point. With reference to the saber, broadsword, and other cut-and-thrust weapons, it distinguishes the use of the point from a blow or cut, and is less important than in small-sword and foil work, where the point alone is used. In fencing thrusts are always made by extending the arm before moving the foot or body.

A thrust (quoth he) of a sword, which went in at his side. Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 71. (Encyc. Dict.) Lieut. Felton, being behind, made a Thrust with a common Tenpenny Knife over Fryer's Arm at the Duke, which lighted so fatally that he slit his Heart in two, leaving the Knife sticking in the Body.

Howell, Letters, I. v. 7.

I have heard Gentlemen say, Sister, that one shou'd take great Care, when one makes a Thrust in Fencing, not to lye open ones self. Congreve, Love for Love, ii. 9.

2. Attack; assault.

There is one thrust at your pure, pretended mechanism.
Dr. H. More, Divine Dialogues.

3. In mech., the stress which acts between two contiguous bodies, or parts of a body, when each pushes the other from itself. A thrust tends to compress or shorten each body on which it acts in the direction of its action.

The section in plan is taken at the level of the head of the flying-buttress. The arrows indicate the directions of the thrusts.

4. In coal-mining, a crushing of the pillars caused by excess of weight of the superincumbent rocks, the floor being harder than the roof. It is nearly the same as creep except that in the latter the workings are disorganized by the upheaval of the floor, which, being softer than the roof, is first to yield to the pressure.

5. The white whey which is the last to leave the curd under pressure. E. H. Knight.—Line of thrust. If a straight line be drawn through each bed-joint in the ring of an arch so as to represent the position and direction of the resultant pressure at that joint, a curve drawn so as to touch each of these lines at its intersection with the joint from which it is derived is the line of thrust of the arch. If the arch is stable its line of thrust must lie within the middle third of the depth of the arch-ring.—Thrust of an arch, the force exerted in an outward direction by an arch, and explained by considering its separate stones or voussoirs as so many wedges. Its tendency is to overturn the abutments or walls from which the arch springs, and to deform and ultimately destroy the arch by causing it to break and rise at its haunches. Hence all arches require to be secured in some way against this force, as by the mass of the abutments (the Roman method), by a system of buttresses (the medieval method), or by ties (the Italian method). Also called push of an arch.

thrust[2], n. An obsolete or dialectal form of thirst.

thrust[3] (thrust), n. See thurse and thrush[3].

thrust-bearing (thrust'bãr″ing), n. The bearing that receives and transmits to the hull of a ship the propelling effort of a screw propeller: usually called thrust-block.

thrust-box (thrust'boks), n. A box-bearing which sustains the end-thrust of a shaft.

thruste†. A Middle English subjunctive form of tharf[1].

thruster (thrus'tėr), n. [< thrust[1] + -er[1].] One who thrusts or stabs; hence, a swordsman.

I was sore thrust at, that I so might fall,
But Thou o'er-threw'st my thrusters.
Davies, Muse's Sacrifice, p. 34. (Davies.) thrust-hoe (thrust'hō), n. An implement like a broad chisel or gouge; a trowel with a long handle, used for cutting up weeds, etc., in agriculture like the common hoe, but with a thrust instead of a pull. Also called Dutch hoe. See ★cut under hoe[1].

thrusting (thrus'ting), n. [Verbal n. of thrust[1], v.] 1. The act of pushing with force.—2. pl. In cheese-making, the white whey, or that which is last pressed out of the curd by the hand, and of which butter is sometimes made. Also thrutchings. [Prov. Eng.]

thrusting-screw (thrus'ting-skrö), n. The screw of a screw-press, as of a cheese-press.

thrustle (thrus'l), n. An obsolete or dialectal variant of throstle.

thrust-plane (thrust'plān), n. In geol., a type of reversed fault where, as the result of enormous tangential pressure, the rocks on the upper side of the fault have been pushed or thrust for a greater or less distance, with an entire severance of continuity, over the underlying masses. The line of junction of the dissevered parts in such cases is denominated a thrust-plane.

thrusty, a. An obsolete or dialectal form of thirsty.

thrutcher (thruch'ėr), n. [A dial. var. of thruster.] A thruster or pusher. [Prov. Eng.]

Those who were the thrutchers [in mining] pushed the truck along with their heads and hands.
W. Besant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 229.

thryve†. An old past participle of thrive.

thud (thud), v.; pret. and pp. thudded, ppr. thudding. [< ME. thuden (pret. thudde, pp. ithud), < AS. thȳdan, press, thrust, stab; cf. thōden, a whirl, a whirlwind.] I. trans. 1†. To push; press.—2. To beat; strike. Jamieson. [Scotch.]—3. To drive with impetuosity. Ramsay. (Jamieson.) [Scotch.]

II. intrans. 1. To emit a low, dull sound such as is produced by a blow upon a comparatively soft substance.

He felt the hollow-beaten mosses thud
And tremble. Tennyson, Balin and Balan.

2. To rush with a hollow sound. Gavin Douglas, tr. of Virgil, p. 422. (Jamieson.) [Scotch.]—3. To move with velocity: as, "he thudded away," Jamieson. [Scotch.]

thud (thud), n. [< thud, v.] The sound produced by a blow upon a comparatively soft substance; a noise like that of a heavy stone striking the ground; hence, a stroke or blow causing a dull, blunt, or hollow sound.

Lyk the blak thud of awful thunderis blast.
Gavin Douglas, tr. of Virgil.

The shot went whistling through the air above our heads, and plunged with a heavy thud into the ground . . . behind us. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 376.

=Syn. See thump.

thug (thug), n. [< Hind. thag, thug (with cerebral th) = Marathi thak, thag, a cheat, knave, impostor, a robber who strangled travelers, thug. The proper designation of the thug as a strangler is phānsigār, < phānsi, a noose.] 1. A member of a confraternity of professional assassins and robbers formerly infesting India, chiefly in the central and northern provinces. The thugs roamed about the country in bands of from 10 to 100, usually in the disguise of peddlers or pilgrims, gaining the confidence of other travelers, whom they strangled, when a favorable opportunity presented itself, with a handkerchief, an unwound turban, or a noosed cord. The shedding of blood was seldom resorted to. The motive of the thugs was not so much lust of plunder as a certain religious fanaticism. The bodies of their victims were hidden in graves dug with a consecrated pickax, and of their spoil one third was devoted to the goddess Kâli, whom they worshiped. About 1830–35 the British government took vigorous measures for their suppression, and thuggery, as an organized system, is now extinct.

Hence—2. A cutthroat; a ruffian; a rough.

During our civil war the regiments which were composed of plug-uglies, thugs, and midnight rounders, with noses laid over to one side as evidence of their prowess in barroom mills and paving-stone riots, were generally cringing cowards in battle. The Century, XXXVI. 249.

thuggee (thug′ē), n. [Hind. thagī, thugī, thuggism, < thag, thug, thug: see thug.] The system of mysterious assassination carried on by the thugs; the profession and practices of the thugs.

Some jackals brought to light the bones of a little child; and the deep grave from which they dug them bore marks of the mystic pickaxe of Thuggee.
J. W. Palmer, The New and the Old, p. 336.

thuggeeism (thug′ē-izm), n. [< thuggee + -ism.] Same as thuggee. Cyc. of India.

thuggery (thug′ėr-i), n. [< thug + -ery.] Same as thuggee.

thuggism (thug′izm), n. [< thug + -ism.] Same as thuggee. Encyc. Brit., XII. 806.

Thule (thū′lē), n. [< L. Thule, Thyle, < Gr. Θούλη, Θύλη (see def.).] The name given by Pytheas of Marseilles to a region or island north of Great Britain, the position of which has been for more than two thousand years the subject of investigation and a matter of controversy. Of the voyage of Pytheas, who was probably nearly contemporaneous with Alexander the Great, nothing is known with certainty, since none of his writings have been preserved. It is, on the whole, most probable that he followed the east coast of Great Britain (of whose size he got a very much exaggerated idea), and that he obtained information in regard to the groups of islands lying still further north—namely, the Orkneys and Shetland—which he embraced under the general name of Thule. From what he is believed to have said in regard to the length of the day in Thule at the summer solstice, it is evident that, as he is known to have been a skilled astronomer, he thought that this land was situated on or near the arctic circle. The Romans frequently added to Thule the designation of Ultima (the Furthest Thule), and, from classic times down to the present day, Thule, besides remaining a subject for voluminous controversy among geographical critics, has been in constant use by poets and others as designating some unknown, far-distant, northern, or purely mythical region, or even some goal, not necessarily geographical, sought to be attained. This use of Thule and Ultima Thule runs through the literature of all the cultivated languages of Europe.

Where the Northern Ocean, in vast whirls, thumb[1] (thum), n. [Early mod. E. also thumbe, thoumbe; < ME. thoumbe, thombe, older thoume, thume, < AS. thūma = OFries. thūma = D. duim = MLG. dūme, dūm, LG. duum = OHG. dūmo, MHG. dūme, G. daum, daumen = Sw. tumme = Norw. tume = Dan. tomme = Goth. thuma*, thumb (cf. AS. thȳmel, E. thimble = Icel. thumall, the thumb of a glove, thumal-fingr = Dan. tommel-finger, the thumb); perhaps connected with L. tumere, swell (see tumid), Gr. τύλος, τύλη, swelling, wale, buckle, knob, Skt. tumra, plump, Zend tūma, stout.] 1. The shortest and thickest finger of the human hand; the pollex; the first digit of the hand, on the radial side, next to the index or forefinger. The perfected thumb is the chief characteristic of the human hand as distinguished from that of all other animals. This perfection is seen in the free movements of the member, and its ready apposability to any one of the other digits or to them all together. The extent to which it stands away from the rest indicates the great power and accuracy with which the hand may be used in grasping, as a prehensile organ, as in holding a pen or a knife. Such freedom and versatility are accomplished by the peculiar construction of the joint at the base of that metacarpal which supports the thumb. This articulation with the carpal bone called the trapezium is by means of reciprocally saddle-shaped articular surfaces, having the ease and extent of movement of a ball-and-socket or universal joint, though by a different mechanism. It is the only instance of such an articulation in the human body. The metacarpal bone of the thumb also differs from the rest in its mode of ossification, having, like the phalanges, a proximal and not a distal epiphysis—that is, the gristly cap that ossifies separately from the rest of the bone is on the end of the bone next to the wrist. The thumb is also peculiar in having but two joints or phalanges, the other digits having three apiece. The thumb is likewise moved by more muscles than those which actuate any other digit. They are a long deep flexor, and three separate long extensors (one for each phalanx and for the metacarpal bone), these four muscles coming to the thumb from high up in the forearm; and also several short muscles confined to the hand, the short flexor, the adductor, and the opponens—altogether eight muscles in long and short sets of four each. The short muscles form the thenar eminence, or fleshy ball of the thumb.

Speke cloos all thyng, as thombe in fiste.
Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 110.

2. The inner, radial, or first digit of the fore paw of any animal. When there are five digits, the first of these always corresponds to the human thumb; otherwise not.—3. The movable radial digit of a bird's manus or pinion, which bears the packet of feathers called the alula or bastard wing, and which is usually movable apart from the rest of the bones. By some it is supposed to correspond to the human thumb. It is more probably the homologue of the index or forefinger. See cut under pinion.

4. The thumb of the foot; the hallux; the inner digit of the foot, called the great toe in man. In quadrumanous or four-handed animals, as monkeys, opossums, and some others, it functions as a thumb, stands apart from the other digits, and so converts the hind foot into a grasping member, or "hand." Its condition in man is quite exceptional in comparison with those animals to which he is nearest allied zoölogically.

5. The hind toe of a bird (except a three-toed woodpecker); the hallux; when there are two hind toes, the inner one of these (except in trogons). It is functionally a thumb, opposing other digits, and fitting the foot for grasping or perching. It is often absent or very small and functionless. Its length, low insertion, and entire freedom of movement are highly characteristic of the passerine series of birds, and varying conditions of its principal flexor tendon give rise to nomopelmous and correlated terms.—Ball of the thumb. See def. 1.—His fingers are all thumbs. See finger.—Horn for the thumb†. See horn.—Rule of thumb. See rule[1].—To bite the thumb at†. See bite.—To fash one's thumb. See fash[1].—Under one's thumb, under one's power or influence; quite subservient.

She . . . is obliged to be silent! I have her under my thumb. Richardson, Sir Charles Grandison, III. xxxviii.

thumb[1] (thum), v. t. [< thumb[1], n.] 1. To handle or perform awkwardly: as, to thumb over a tune. Imp. Dict.—2. To soil or wear out with much handling; hence, to use, read, or turn over the pages of (as a book).

Shall I thumb Holy Books, confin'd
With Abigails, forsaken?
Prior, The Female Phaeton.

Horace and Virgil must be thumbed by a boy, as well before he goes to an apprenticeship as to the university.
Steele, Tatler, No. 173.

3. To turn (one's glass) over the thumb: an old custom when persons were drinking together, intending to show that the glass had been emptied so that the small drop remaining would lie on the thumb-nail without running off. Compare supernaculum.—To thumb the hat. See hat[1].

Thunbergia (thun-bėr′ji-ą), n. [NL. (Linnæus filius, 1781), named after K. P. Thunberg, 1743–1828, a Swedish botanist, author of the "Flora Japonica" and "Flora Capensis."] An untenable name for Flemingia, a genus of plants, of the family Acanthaceæ. It is characterized by its fruit, a beaked capsule with two to four seeds; and by its contorted and nearly equal corolla-lobes, and roundish seeds without a retinaculum. There are about 100 species, natives of tropical and southern Africa, Madagascar, and warm parts of Asia. They are commonly twining vines, or in a number of species low erect herbs. They bear opposite leaves, often triangular, hastate, cordate, or narrower, and purple, blue, yellow, or white flowers solitary in the axils or forming terminal racemes. The flowers often combine two colors, as Flemingia laurifolia (Thunbergia laurifolia of Lindley), a greenhouse climber with large yellow-throated blue flowers, and the hardy annual Flemingia alata (Thunbergia alata of Boïer), known locally by the name black-eyed-Susan from its buff, orange, or white flowers with a purplish-black center. Other species, as Flemingia grandiflora, are favorite trellis-climbers, commonly known by the name Thunbergia.

thunder (thun′dėr), n. [< ME. thunder, thonder, thondre (with excrescent d as also in the D. form), earlier thoner, thuner (> E. dial. thunner), < AS. thunor (gen. thunres, thonres), thunder (Thunor, also, after Icel., Thur, the god of thunder, Thor), = OS. Thuner, the god of thunder, = OFries. thuner = D. donder = OHG. donar, MHG. doner, G. donner, thunder (OHG. Donar, the god of thunder, Thor), = Icel. Thōrr (dat. and acc. Thōr, in Runic inscriptions also Thur), the god of thunder, Thor (cf. Icel. Thundr (gen. Thundar), one of the names of Odin—appar. a reflex of the AS. or E. word), = Sw. Dan. Tor, the god of thunder, Thor (Sw. tor-dön, Dan. tor-den, thunder: Sw. dön (later dån) = Dan. dön = E. din), = Goth. thunars* (not recorded); akin to L. tonitrus, rarely tonitru, tonitruum, thunder, Skt. tanyatu, thunder, tanayitnus, roaring, thundering; from a verb shown in AS. thunian, rattle, roar, thunder, L. tonare, roar, thunder (cf. AS. tonian (rare), MD. donen, thunder), Skt. √ tan, roar. This root is usually identified with that of AS. thynne, E. thin, etc. (see thin[1]), the development being variously explained: e. g., 'extension, sound, noise, thunder.' But the two are no doubt entirely distinct: the sense 'tone' in Gr. τόνος is developed from that of 'tension' in quite another way. The √ tan, thunder, is perhaps the same, without the initial s, as the √ stan, in Gr. στένειν = Lith. steneti = Russ. stenatĭ, stonatĕ, groan, = Skt. √ stan, roar, thunder, E. stun, etc. (a similar double root in st- and t- is shown in the etym. of thatch and other words: see stun). Hence thunder, v., and the first element of Thursday, and, from the Scand., Thor.] 1. The loud noise which follows a flash of lightning, due to the sudden disturbance of the air by the disruptive discharge of electricity. The character of the sound varies with the intensity and distance of the discharge, the form, number, and relative arrangement of the clouds, and the nature of the surrounding country. The position of the observer relative to the path of the discharge has also an important influence on the character of the sound heard. If the observer is about equally distant from the two bodies between which the discharge takes place, the sound is short and sharp, while if his position is approximately in line with the path of discharge, so as to be considerably further from one body than the other, the sound is prolonged into a long roll, due to the difference of time which the sound takes to reach the ear from the different parts of the path. In hilly regions, and where there are many clouds in the neighborhood of the discharge, the sound is echoed and reëchoed, causing a prolonged and more or less continuous roar. As sound travels at the rate of about 1,100 feet per second, and light at the rate of about 186,000 miles per second, the number of miles the observer is from the discharge will be nearly one fifth the number of seconds which elapse between seeing the flash and hearing the sound. Discharges between clouds high up in the atmosphere are not usually heard through so long distances as might be expected, owing to the diminution of the intensity of sounds in passing from rarer to denser media. Discharges from clouds near the earth's surface to the earth can be heard as far as any other sound of equal intensity.

> No thunders shook with deep intestine sound
> The blooming groves that girdled her around.
> Cowper, Heroism, l. 5.

2. The destructive agent in a thunder-storm; a discharge of lightning; a thunderbolt.

> And therfore hathe White Thorn many Vertues: For he that berethe a Braunche on him thereoffe, no Thondre ne no maner of Tempest may dere him.
> Mandeville, Travels, p. 13.

> I told him, the revenging gods
> 'Gainst parricides did all their thunders bend.
> Shak., Lear, ii. 1. 48.

> By the gods, my heart speaks this;
> And if the least fall from me not perform'd,
> May I be struck with thunder!
> Beau. and Fl., Philaster, v. 3.

3. Any loud resounding noise: as, thunders of applause.

> The thunder of my cannon shall be heard.
> Shak., K. John, i. 1. 26.

> Welcome her, thunders of fort and of fleet!
> Tennyson, Welcome to Alexandra.

4. An awful or startling denunciation or threat.

> The thunders of the Vatican could no longer strike terror into the heart of princes, as in the days of the Crusades. Prescott.

5. As an exclamation, an abbreviation of by thunder, a mild oath. Compare thunderation. [Colloq.]—Blood-and-thunder, sensational; full of bloody deeds and bravado: noting plays, novels, etc. [Colloq.]—Cross of thunder. See cross[1].

thunder (thun′dėr), v. [< ME. thunderen, thonderen, thuneren, thoneren (> E. dial. thunner), < AS. thunrian = D. donderen = OHG. donarōn, MHG. donren, MG. dunren, G. donnern = Sw. dundra = Dan. dundre, thunder; from the noun.] I. intrans. 1. To give forth thunder; resound with thunder; formerly, to lighten (and thunder): often used impersonally: as, it thundered yesterday.

> Wednesday, the vj Day of Januarii, the wynde Rose a yens vs, with grett tempest, thonnderyng and lyghtnyng all Day and all nyght, So owtrageowsly that we knew not wher wee war. Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 60.

> He would not flatter Neptune for his trident
> Or Jove for 's power to thunder.
> Shak., Cor., iii. 1. 256.

2. To make a sound resembling thunder; make a loud noise, particularly a heavy sound of some continuance.

> Canst thou thunder with a voice like him? Job xl. 9.

> Ay me, what act
> That roars so loud, and thunders in the index?
> Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4. 52.

> His dreadful voice no more > Would thunder in my ears. Milton, P. L., x. 780.

> I will have his head, were Richard thundering at the gates of York. Scott, Ivanhoe, xxxiv.

3. To utter loud denunciations or threats.

> The orators on the other side thundered against sinful associations. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xiii.

The Thundering Legion. See legion.

II. trans. 1. To emit with or as with the noise of thunder; utter with a loud and threatening voice; utter or issue by way of threat or denunciation.

> Oracles severe
> Were daily thunder'd in our gen'ral's ear.
> Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., xiii. 293.

> Should eighty-thousand college-councils
> Thunder "Anathema," friend, at you.
> Tennyson, To Rev. F. D. Maurice.

2. To lay on with vehemence. [Rare.]

> Therewith they gan, both furious and fell,
> To thunder blowes, and fiersly to assaile
> Each other. Spenser, F. Q., I. vi. 43.

thunder-and-lightning (thun′dėr-and-līt′ning), n. Same as Oxford mixture (which see, under mixture). [Colloq.]—Thunder-and-lightning snake. See snake.

thunderation (thun-dėr-ā′shọn), n. Same as thunder, 5. [Colloq., U. S.]

thunder-ax (thun′dėr-aks), n. Same as thunderbolt, 3 (a).

thunderbeat† (thun′dėr-bēt), v. t. [< thunder + beat[1].] To beat with thundering strokes. [Rare.]

> So he them thunderbet whereso he went,
> That neuer a stroke in vaine his right hand spent.
> Hudson, tr. of Du Bartas's Judith, v. 397. (Davies.)

thunder-bird (thun′dėr-bėrd), n. 1. An Australian thick-headed shrike, Pachycephala gutturalis. It is about 6 inches long, rich-yellow below, with a jet-black collar and white throat, black head, and partly black tail. It was called by Latham guttural thrush, Turdus gutturalis, and black-breasted flycatcher, Muscicapa pectoralis, by others white-throated thickhead, and it has also a variety of French and New Latin names. It closely resembles the species figured under Pachycephala.

2. In the mythology of some low tribes, an imaginary bird supposed to cause thunder by the flapping of its wings, or considered as personifying it. E. B. Tylor.

thunderblast (thun′dėr-blåst), n. [< ME. thonderblast; < thunder + blast.] A peal of thunder.

thunderbolt (thun′dėr-bōlt), n. [< thunder + bolt[1].] 1. A flash of lightning with the accompanying crash of thunder: so called because regarded as due to the hurling of a bolt or shaft at the object struck by the lightning. See def. 2.

> The term thunderbolt, which is nowadays rarely used except by poets (and by the penny-a-liners), preserves the old notion that something solid and intensely hot passed along the track of a lightning flash and buried itself in the ground. P. G. Tait, Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 330.

2. The imaginary bolt or shaft (often regarded as a stone) conceived as the material agent or substance of a flash of lightning, and the cause of the accompanying crash of thunder: an attribute of Zeus or Jupiter as the god of thunder (Jupiter Tonans); specifically, in her., a bearing representing a thunderbolt more or less like that of Jupiter. It is often composed of barbed lances, the shafts of which are broken into dovetails, and a group of these put side by side, having a pair of wings attached, is emblematic of radiating light; sometimes it is a double flame of fire pointing up and down and accompanied with lances, radiating blades, etc.

Jupiter holding a Thunderbolt. (From a Pompeian wall-painting.)

3. A stone or other hard concretion of distinctive shape, usually tapering or spear-like, found in the ground, and supposed in popular superstition to have been the material substance of a thunderbolt (in sense 2), and to have fallen from heaven with the lightning. Specifically—(a) One of various polished stone implements, celts, and the like, found in the ground, supposed to have fallen from the sky. Also called thunder-ax, thunder-hammer, thunder-stone, ceraunia, and storm-stone. (b) A mass of iron pyrites occurring, either as a nodule or a bunch of crystals, in the chalk of England. (c) One of sundry fossil cephalopods, as belemnites. Also called thunder-stone. See cut under belemnite.

4. Figuratively, one who is daring or irresistible; one who acts with fury or with sudden and resistless force.

Be yourself, great sir,
The thunderbolt of war.
Massinger, Bashful Lover.

Who can omit the Gracchi, who declare
The Scipios' worth, those thunderbolts of war?
Dryden, Æneid, vi. 1159.

5. A dreadful threat, denunciation, censure, or the like, proceeding from some high authority; a fulmination.

He severely threatens such with the thunderbolt of excommunication. Hakewill.

A greater wreck, a deeper fall,
A shock to one — a thunderbolt to all.
Byron, Mazeppa, i.

6. pl. The white campion (Lychnis alba), the corn-poppy (Papaver Rhœas), or the bladder-campion (Silene vulgaris) — the last plant so named from the slight report made by exploding the inflated calyx. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.]

thunderbolt† (thun'dėr-bōlt), v. t. [< thunderbolt, n.] To strike with or as with lightning.

This was done so in an instant that the very act did overrun Philoclea's sorrow, sorrow not being able so quickly to thunderbolt her heart through her senses.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

thunderbolt-beetle (thun'dėr-bōlt-bē″tl), n. A longicorn beetle, Arhopalus fulminans, which burrows in the sap-wood of the oak and chestnut: so called from the zigzag gray lines, likened to thunderbolts, which cross the dark elytra.

thunder-bounce† (thun'dėr-bouns), n. A sudden noise like thunder. [Rare.]

When blustering Boreas tosseth up the deep,
And thumps a thunder-bounce.
Ford, Lover's Melancholy, i. 1.

thunderburst (thun'dėr-bėrst), n. A burst of thunder. Imp. Dict.

thunder-carriage (thun'dėr-kar″āj), n. A name given to the conventional representation in early Scandinavian art of a car or chariot in which the god Thor is supposed to ride from place to place. Worsaae, Danish Art, p. 168.

thunderclap (thun'dėr-klap), n. [< ME. thonder-clap; < thunder + clap[1].] A clap or burst of thunder; a sudden report of a discharge of atmospheric electricity; a thunder-peal.

Noble arms,
You ribs for mighty minds, you iron houses,
Made to defy the thunder-claps of fortune,
Rust and consuming time must now dwell with ye!
Fletcher, Loyal Subject, i. 3.

thunder-cloud (thun'dėr-kloud), n. A cloud that produces lightning and thunder. Such clouds are of the cumulus or strato-cumulus type, generally appearing in dense, dark, towering masses, with a cirro-stratus overflow. In hilly regions thunder-clouds have been observed entirely within a limit of 1,500 feet above the earth, but in general the base of the cloud is from 3,000 to 4,000 feet high, and its vertical thickness from 2,000 to 12,000 feet.

These Tornadoes commonly come against the Wind that is then blowing, as our Thunder-clouds are often observed to do in England. Dampier, Voyages, I. 79.

thunder-crack (thun'dėr-krak), n. A clap of thunder.

Nor is he mov'd with all the thunder-cracks
Of tyrants' threats.
Daniel, To the Countess of Cumberland, st. 5.

thunder-dart† (thun'dėr-därt), n. A thunderbolt. Spenser, Visions of Bellay, l. 53.

thunder-darter (thun'dėr-där″tėr), n. He who darts the thunder; Jove.

O thou great thunder-darter of Olympus, forget that thou art Jove, the king of gods. Shak., T. and C., ii. 3. 11.

thunder-dint† (thun'dėr-dint), n. [ME., also thonderdent; < thunder + dint.] A thunderclap.

How Cappaneus the proude
With thunder-dynt was slayn, that criede loude.
Chaucer, Troilus, v. 1505.

thunder-dirt (thun'dėr-dėrt), n. The gelatinous volva of Ileodictyon, especially I. cibarium, a gasteromycetous fungus, which is or was formerly eaten by the aborigines of New Zealand. See Ileodictyon.

thunder-drop (thun'dėr-drop), n. One of the large, heavy, thinly scattered drops of rain which prelude a thunder-shower.

Her slow full words sank thro' the silence drear,
As thunder-drops fall on a sleeping sea.
Tennyson, Fair Women.

thunderer (thun'dėr-ėr), n. [< thunder + -er[1].] One who thunders; specifically, with the definite article, Jupiter (called Jupiter Tonans).

The faults of kings are by the Thunderer,
As oft as they offend, to be reveng'd.
Beau. and Fl., Thierry and Theodoret, i. 2.

When now the thund'rer on the sea-beat coast
Had fix'd great Hector and his conqu'ring host.
Pope, Iliad, xiii. 1.

thunder-fish (thun'dėr-fish), n. 1. The electric catfish of the Nile, Torpedo electricus, which is capable of giving shocks like the electric eel and electric ray. Also known by its Arabian name raasch. See cut under Malapterurus. — 2. A European cyprinoid, Misgurnus fossilis: apparently so called as forced out of the mud, in which it habitually burrows, by a thunder-shower. See misgurn.

thunder-fit (thun'dėr-fit), n. A shock or noise resembling thunder. [Rare.]

The ice did split with a thunder-fit;
The helmsman steer'd us through!
Coleridge, Ancient Mariner, i.

thunder-flower (thun'dėr-flou″ėr), n. A name of the stitchwort (Alsine Holostea), of the corn-poppy (Papaver Rhœas), and of the white campion (Lychnis alba). Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.]

thunder-fly (thun'dėr-flī), n. A thrips; any member of the Thripidæ. See cut under Thrips.

The tiny thunder-flies which we often find during the summer in countless multitudes.
Adams, Man. Nat. Hist., p. 213.

thunder-gust (thun'dėr-gust), n. A thunderstorm. [Rare.]

Until the thundergust o'erpass.
Lowell, On Planting a Tree at Inverara.

thunder-hammer (thun'dėr-ham″ėr), n. See thunderbolt, 3 (a).

thunder-head (thun'dėr-hed), n. One of the round compact swelling cumulus clouds which frequently develop into thunder-clouds. The thunder-head is seen at first, perhaps, on the horizon, of a brilliant whiteness; then, slowly rising, and darkening until only a silver edge is left of its brightness, it becomes a towering mass of black thunder-cloud. [Originally New Eng.]

On either hand a sullen rear of woes,
Whose garnered lightnings none could guess,
Piling its thunder-heads, and muttering "Cease!"
Lowell, Under the Old Elm, vii. 2.

thunder-headed (thun'dėr-hed″ed), a. Pertaining to a thunder-head; like a thunder-head: as, thunder-headed clouds.

thunder-house (thun'dėr-hous), n. A small model of a house with electric conductors so arranged as to show, when a discharge is passed through them, how a building may be injured by lightning.

thundering (thun'dėr-ing), n. [Verbal n. of thunder, v.] The report of a discharge of lightning; thunder.

Intreat the Lord . . . that there be no more mighty thunderings and hail. Ex. ix. 28.

Maundrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 62.

thunder-storm (thun'dėr-stôrm), n. A storm accompanied by lightning and thunder, occurring when the atmosphere is in a state of unstable equilibrium, and has a high relative humidity. Thunder-storms have been conveniently classified into heat thunder-storms and cyclonic thunder-storms. The former is the type preëminently characteristic of the equatorial regions, where lightning and thunder occur on their grandest and most violent scale. Here the thunder-storm has little or no progressive motion, and its entire history may be followed in the overturning process by which an abnormally hot, humid, unstable condition of the atmosphere becomes stable. In summer similar heat thunder-storms arise locally in temperate latitudes, especially in hilly or mountainous countries. Thunder-storms of the second class are associated with areas of low pressure, and are found most frequently on their southern border, in the quadrant where an unstable atmospheric condition tends to prevail. These thunder-storms have a progressive motion eastward, but their velocity may be quite different from that of the general cyclonic movement with which they are associated. The different isobaric types known as secondaries and V-shaped depressions give rise to thunder-storms having distinct features, and those accompanying the latter have been specifically designated line thunder-storms. In general, the diurnal and annual periods and other characteristics of cyclonic thunder-storms exhibit a wide diversity in different regions, and thereby illustrate the intimate dependence of these storms on the differing cyclonic conditions which characterize different climates. Thus, in Iceland thunder-storms occur only in winter, so that the usual annual periodicity is there reversed.

thunderstrike (thun'dėr-strīk), v. t.; pret. thunderstruck, pp. thunderstruck or thunderstricken, ppr. thunderstriking. [< thunder + strike; a back-formation from thunderstruck.] 1. To strike, blast, or injure by or as by lightning; strike with or as with a thunderbolt. [Rare.]

The armaments which thunderstrike the walls
Of rock-built cities, bidding nations quake.
Byron, Childe Harold, iv. 181.

2. To astonish or strike dumb, as with something terrible: usually in the past participle.

thunder-stroke† (thun'dėr-strōk), n. A thunder-clap; a stroke or blast by lightning.

E. also thorrocke; < ME. thurrok, the hold of a ship, < AS. thurruc, a small boat (glossing cumba and caupolus), also prob. the hold of a ship (also, according to Lye, a drain (canalis); but see thurruck), = MD. durck, dorck, the hold of a ship; perhaps orig. (like hold itself) 'hole,' akin to Goth. thairko, a hole, and to AS. thurh, thuruh, E. thorough, through[1]: see thorough.] The hold of a ship; also, the bilge.

The same harm dooth som tyme the smale dropes of water that entren thurgh a litel orevace into the thurrok, and in the botme of the shipe. Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

Ye shall understande that there ys a place in the bottom of a shyppe wherein ys gathered all the fylthe that cometh into the shyppe—and it is called in some contre of this londe a thorrocke. Other calle yt an hamron, and some calle yt the bulcke of the shyppe.
Our Ladyes Mirroure (London, 1530), quoted by Tyrwhitt.

thurrough (thur'ō), n. [A dial. var. of furrow (as, reversely, fill[2] for thill), or else a var. of thurruck, a drain, regarded as a particular use of thurrock.] A furrow. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

thurruck (thur'uk), n. [A further var. of thurrough, itself a var. of furrow, or else a var. and particular use of thurrock. The AS. thurruc defined by Lye as a canal or drain (canalis), does not appear to have had that sense: see thurrock.] A drain. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

Thursday (thėrz dā), n. [< ME. Thursday, Thursdey, Thors day, Thores day, a contracted form (after the Icel. Thōrsdagr) of early ME. Thunres dæi (which would reg. give mod. E. Thundersday*), < AS. Thunres dæg = OFries. Thunresdi, Dunrisdei, Tongeresdei, Tornsdei = D. Donderdag = MLG. Donerdach = OHG. Donarestag, MHG. Donerstac, G. Donnerstag = Icel. Thōrsdagr = Sw. Dan. Torsdag; orig. two words. 'Thunder's day,' 'Thor's day,' translating L. Dies Jovis: see thunder, Thor, and day[1].] The fifth day of the week. See week. Abbreviated Th., Thur.—Bounds Thursday, Ascension day: so called from the old parish custom of marking or beating the bounds. See perambulation.—Great Thursday, Great and Holy Thursday, in the Gr. Ch., same as Maundy Thursday.—Green Thursday, Thursday in Holy Week; Maundy Thursday.—Holy Thursday, Ascension day: so called because it is the greatest festival of the church year which falls regularly upon a Thursday. This name has always been given to Ascension day in England, both before and since the Reformation. The application of the name to Thursday in Holy Week, properly Maundy Thursday, is recent and incorrect, resting either on confusion or on imitation of foreign (continental) usage.—Maundy Thursday. See maundy.—Remission Thursday, Sheer Thursday. Same as Maundy Thursday.—Thursday of the Great Canon. See Great Canon, under great.

thurset† (thėrs), n. [Also dial. thrush, thrust (as in hobthrush, var. hobthrust), < ME. thurse, thursse, thyrce, thurs, thirs, also transposed thrusse, thrwsse, thrusche, < AS. thyrs = OHG. durs, duris, turs, thuris, MHG. durse, dürse, dürsch, also turse, türse, türsch, a giant, demon, = Icel. thurs (pron. thûs), a giant, goblin, dull fellow, = Norw. tuss, dial. tusse, tust, a goblin, kobold, elf, a dull fellow, = Dan. tosse, a booby, fool. For the supposed relation with deuce, see deuce[1]. The word thurse remains in various local names, as Thursfield, Thursley, Thursly, Thurso, etc. (in some instances probably confused with Thor's as in Thursday).] A giant; a gigantic specter; an apparition. Kennett (in Halliwell, under thyrce); Way (in Prompt. Parv., p. 491, note). [Prov. Eng.]

Nineteenth Century, XX. 113.

Thuya (thū′yä), n. [NL., < Gr. θύα, θύα, an African tree with sweet-smelling wood, supposed to be a kind of juniper or arbor-vitæ.] A spelling given by Tournefort and many other authors to Thuja, a genus of conifers, of the tribe Cupresseæ. It is distinguished from Cupressus, the cypress, by its smaller, less indurated cones, and usually complanate leafy branches. The 4 species are natives of North America and central and eastern Asia. They are evergreen trees and shrubs, having the flat leaf-like branchlets almost wholly covered by small appressed imbricated leaves, some of which are awl-shaped and slightly spreading; others, on different branchlets, are blunt, scale-like, and adnate. The small ovoid or oblong cone rarely exceeds half an inch in length, and is usually composed of from three to six pairs of coriaceous scales, dry and spreading when ripe, the lowest and uppermost empty, the others bearing two or three seeds each. The typical species, Thuja occidentalis, the arbor-vitæ, or white cedar, of the northern United States, forms extensive cedar-swamps from Minnesota to central New York and New Brunswick, and occurs on rocky banks and along the mountains to North Carolina. It is usually a small tree, but is sometimes from 50 to 70 feet high. It is cultivated for lawns and hedges, and yields a valuable light-brown wood, a very aromatic oil, and a tincture used as an emmenagogue. T. plicata, the canoe-cedar, or red cedar, of the West, found chiefly from Alaska to Oregon, is a large tree often from 200 to 250 feet high and 16 feet in diameter. One is said to have measured 22 feet in diameter and 325 in height. The trunk rises often for 100 feet as a columnar shaft free from branches. The trunks were hollowed out by the Indians into canoes. The dull reddish-brown wood — which is light, soft, compact, easily worked, and, as in the other species, slow to decay — is greatly valued for cabinet-work, interior finish, cooperage, etc. The bark yields a fiber which is made into hats, mats, and baskets. In cultivation it is often known by the name T. Lobbii, and in Europe as Libocedrus decurrens, by an early exchange with the true Libocedrus, the incense-cedar of California. The other commonly cultivated species, T. orientalis, the Chinese arbor-vitæ, native of eastern Asia, is parent of numerous varieties remarkably different in habit, with bright-green, golden, silvery, or variegated spray, closer and more vertical than in the tree of the Atlantic coast, or drooping, elongated, and slightly cylindrical in the variety pendula, the weeping arbor-vitæ. Several other species formerly classed here are now separated, as the genera Thujopsis and Chamæcyparis. Compare also Retinospora.

thuyite (thū′yīt), n. [< Thuya + -ite[2].] A fossil plant supposed to belong or be closely related to Thuja. Several plants from the Wealden and Jurassic have been described under Thuytes as a generic name, in regard to all or most of which there is considerable uncertainty.

Thuyopsidinæ (thū-yop-si-dī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Thuyopsis (-id-) + -inæ.] Improper spelling of Thujopsidinæ, a subtribe of conifers, of the tribe Cupresseæ, typified by the genus Thujopsis, and comprising also Libocedrus and Thuja.

Thuyopsis (thū-yop′sis), n. [NL. (Siebold and Zuccarini, 1842), < Thuya + Gr. ὄψις, resemblance.] A genus of conifers, of the tribe Cupresseæ, type of the subtribe Thujopsidinæ: properly Thujopsis. It is characterized by its narrowly two-winged seeds, four or five under each of four to eight fertile scales of the globose cone. The only species, Thujopsis dolabrata, is a native of Japan, there known as akeki. It is a tall conical evergreen from 50 to 90 feet high. Its pendulous whorled primary branches bear very numerous two-ranked branchlets wholly covered by opposite leaves imbricated in four ranks, the marginal ranks larger, acute, and slightly spreading, the others appressed, glandular, and shining. It is cultivated in dwarf varieties as a shrub for lawns, under the name of hatchet-leaved arbor-vitæ.

thwack (thwak), v. t. [Also dial. twack; a var. of whack, prob. due in part to confusion with the equiv. thack[2], and in part to a phonetic interchange, wh- to thw-, which occurs in the other direction in white[2], var. of thwite, in whittle, var. of thwittle, in wharl, var. of thwart[1], etc.] 1. To strike with something flat or hard; beat; bang; whack.

He shall not stay,
We'll thwack him hence with distaffs.
Shak., W. T., i. 2. 37.

Take all my cushions down, and thwack them soundly,
After my feast of millers.
Middleton (and another), Mayor of Queenborough, v. 1.

2†. To ram down; pack.

The letters he addressed me from time to time, to the number of six hundred, thwackt with loue and kindnesse.
Stanihurst, Describ. of Ireland (Holinshed's Chron., I. 42).

thylacine (thil'a-sin), n. [< NL. Thylacinus, q. v.] The native wild "dog," "wolf," "tiger," or "hyena" of Tasmania, Thylacinus cynocephalus, the largest living carnivorous marsupial.

Thylacine Dasyure, or Zebra-wolf (Thylacinus cynocephalus).

It is of a grayish-brown color, banded transversely with black on the back and hips, whence it is also called zebra-wolf. The same, or a closely related animal, formerly inhabited also Australia, but is now extinct. Also used attributively.

Thylacinus (thī-las'i-nus), n. [NL. (Temminck), < Gr. θύλαξ (θυλακ-), a pouch, + κύων (κυν-), a dog.] A genus of carnivorous marsupial mammals, containing the thylacine dasyure, T. cynocephalus, of the family Dasyuridæ and subfamily Dasyurinæ. The teeth are 46; the vertebræ are C. 7, D. 13, L. 6, S. 2, Cd. 23; there are no ossified marsupial bones, nor is there any hallux; the general form is that of a dog or wolf. See thylacine (with cut).

Thylacoleo (thil-a-kō'lē-ō), n. [NL., < Gr. θύλαξ (θυλακ-), a pouch, + λέων, a lion.] A genus of large extinct diprotodont marsupials, having a large trenchant fourth premolar. There is one species, T. carnifex, originally considered carnivorous, but having affinities with the herbivorous kangaroos and phalangers.

Thymallus (thī-mal'us), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1829), < Gr. θύμαλλος, some unknown fish.] In ichth., a genus of salmonoid fishes; the graylings. They are not anadromous, have moderate scales, the tongue toothless, and the dorsal fin long and very high, of about twenty rays. They are beautiful game-fishes, of northern regions. The American grayling is T. signifer. See cut under grayling.

thyme (tīm), n. [Early mod. E. also thime, time (the spelling with th being in artificial imitation of the L.); < ME. time, tyme, < OF. thym, F. thym = Pr. thimi = It. timo, < L. thymum, ML. also thimus, timus, < Gr. θύμον, also θύμος, neut., thyme; prob. connected with θύος, incense, < θύειν*, smell: see thus[2].] A plant of the genus Thymus. The common garden thyme is T. vulgaris, a native of southern Europe. It is a bushy undershrub from 6 to 10 inches high, with many stems, which are erect or decumbent at the base, and bear very small ovate leaves. It is of a pungent, aromatic property, and is largely cultivated as a seasoning for soups, sauces, etc. From it also is distilled, especially in France, where the plant abounds, the oil of thyme, which is considerably used in veterinary practice and in perfumery, and in the latter use often passes as oil of origanum. The wild or creeping thyme, or mother-of-thyme, is T. Serpyllum, a less erect plant forming broad dense tufts, having properties similar to those of T. vulgaris, but less cultivated for culinary use. It also yields an oil, from one of the names of the plant sometimes called serpolet-oil. (See serpolet.) The lemon or lemon-scented thyme, sometimes named T. citriodorus, is regarded as a variety of this plant. Both species, especially variegated varieties of the latter, are desirable border or rockwork plants.

Wild Thyme (Thymus Serpyllum).
a, the corolla; b, the calyx; c, a stamen.

I know a bank where the wild thyme grows.
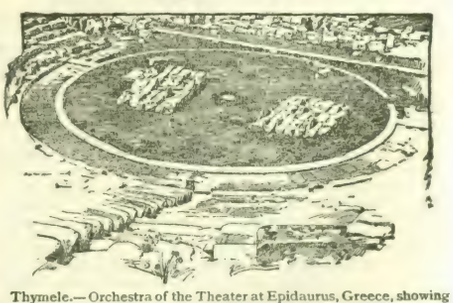
Shak., M. N. D., ii. 1. 249.



But, if a pinching winter thou foresee,
And would'st preserve thy famished family,
With fragrant thyme the city fumigate.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv. 350.

Basil thyme, Clinopodium Acinos (see basil-thyme); applied also to C. Nepeta and perhaps some other species.—Cat-thyme. (a) See Teucrium. (b) Same as herb mastic (which see, under herb).—Horse-thyme, Clinopodium vulgare; sometimes, also, the common wild thyme. [Prov. Eng.]—Oil of thyme. See oil.—Shepherd's thyme, the wild thyme. [Prov. Eng.]—Virginian thyme. See Pycnanthemum.—Water-thyme, a fresh-water plant, Philotria Canadensis, of the Vallisneriaceæ: applied by Izaak Walton to some plant not determined. The members of this genus did not grow in England in his time. Britten and Holland.

Thymelæa (thim-e-lē'ä), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. thymelæa, < Gr. θυμελαία, a plant, Daphne Gnidium, < θύμος, thyme, + ἐλαία, olive-tree.] An untenable name for Ligia, a genus of dicotyledonous apetalous plants, of the family Daphnaceæ. It is characterized by bisexual unappendaged flowers with a spreading border, usually persistent around the dry membranous one-celled pericarp. There are about 20 species, natives of the Mediterranean region from the Canary Islands to Persia, with a few of wider range in Europe and middle Asia. They are perennial herbs, or rarely small shrubs with scattered leaves, generally small and narrow, and small sessile flowers, solitary or clustered in the axils. Ligia tinctoria (Thymelæa tinctoria of Endlicher), of the south of Europe, yields a yellow dye. See herb terrible, under herb.

Thymelæaceæ (thim″e-lē-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Thymelæa + -aceæ.] The name given by Reichenbach (1841) to the Daphnaceæ, a family of dicotyledonous plants, of the order Daphnales, based on Thymelæa of Tournefort. It includes about 400 species, belonging to 41 genera classed in 5 subfamilies, of which Octolepis, Aquilaria, Phaleria, Ligia, and Drapetes are the types. They are usually trees or shrubs, with a tough filamentous or netted bark. They bear entire leaves, usually numerous, small, and with a single vein. The flowers are commonly capitate and somewhat involucrate, and are followed by an indehiscent fruit, a nutlet, berry, or drupe, or, in the Aquilarieæ, a loculicidal capsule. They are natives of temperate climates, especially of South Africa, the Mediterranean region, and Australia, fewer in America, and rare in the tropics. Among the important genera are Daphne, the true type of the family, Passerina, Stellera, and Dirca, the leatherwood, the last-named being the only genus in the United States.

thymele (thim'e-lē), n. [< L. thymela, thymele, < Gr. θυμέλη, the altar of Dionysus in the orchestra of a Greek theater, lit. 'a place for sacrifice,' < θύειν, sacrifice.] 1. In Gr. antiq., an altar; particularly, the small altar of Dionysus which occupied the central point of the orchestra of the Greek theater, and was a visible token of the religious character of the dramatic representations.—2. [cap.] [NL. (Fabricius, 1808).] In entom., a genus of hesperian butterflies, or skippers. T. alveolus is the grizzled skipper, a British species.

Thymele.—Orchestra of the Theater at Epidaurus, Greece, showing the ancient Hellenic circle floored with beaten cinders (κονιστρα) for the chorus. The site of the thymele is marked by the block of white stone in the middle.

thymelici (thī-mel'i-sī), n. pl. [L., pl. of thymelicus, < Gr. θυμελικός, belonging to the thymele: see thymele.] In the anc. Gr. drama, the chorus: so called because their evolutions took place around the thymele.

thymiatechny (thim'i-a-tek-ni), n. [Irreg. < Gr. θυμίαμα, Ionic θυμίημα, that which is burned as incense (< θυμιᾶν, burn as incense: see thymiaterion), + τέχνη, art, skill.] The art of employing perfumes in medicine. Dunglison.

thymiaterion (thim″i-a-tē'ri-on), n.; pl. thymiateria (-ä). [< Gr. θυμιατήριον, a censer, < θυμιᾶν, burn as incense, < θῦμα, a sacrifice, < θύειν, sacrifice.] A censer, especially one of ancient Greek origin, or one used in the Greek Church.

★thymic (thī′mik), a. Of or pertaining to the thymus gland: as, the thymic vein.—Thymic asthma. Same as laryngismus stridulus.

thymol (tī′mol), n. [< thyme + -ol.] A phenol of cymene, $C_{10}H_{13}.OH$, a stearoptene obtained from oil of thyme by distillation. It is a crystalline solid having a powerful odor and a very acrid and caustic taste, but its solution sufficiently diluted has the smell of thyme and an agreeable cooling taste. It is slightly soluble in water, readily soluble in alcohol. It is powerfully antiseptic in its properties, and is used in medicine as a dressing for unhealthy wounds or sores.

Thymus[1] (thī′mus), n. [NL. (Rivinus, 1690), < L. thymum, < Gr. θύμον, θύμος, thyme: see thyme.] A genus of labiate plants, belonging to the tribe Saturejeæ, type of the subtribe Thyminæ; the thyme. It is characterized by axillary or spiked few-flowered verticillasters, a distinctly two-lipped, ten- to thirteen-nerved calyx closed within by hairs, and a slightly two-lipped corolla with four perfect stamens. About 50 species are recognized by recent authors, nearly all natives of the Mediterranean region, a few in the Canary Islands and Abyssinia, and one or two widely dispersed over the temperate and northern parts of Europe and Asia. They are small shrubby plants, with entire leaves small and nearly alike throughout, or in the spike changed into bracts, the flowers in separate axillary whorls or in loose or compact terminal spikes. The species are known in general as thyme. See also mastic-herb, and cut under stamen.

thymus[2] (thī′mus), n. [NL., < Gr. θύμος, m., a warty excrescence, a glandular substance, the sweetbread: so called because likened to a bunch of thyme, < θύμον, θύμος, thyme: see thyme.] 1. In anat., a fetal structure, vestigial in the adult, one of the so-called ductless glands, of no known function, situated inside the thorax, behind the breast-bone, near the root of the neck. The thymus of veal and lamb is called sweetbread, and more fully throat or neck-sweetbread, to distinguish it from the pancreas or stomach-sweetbread.

2. In pathol., same as acrothymion.

thymy (tī′mi), a. [< thyme + -y[1].] 1. Abounding with thyme; fragrant with thyme.

> Love paced the thymy plots of Paradise.
> Tennyson, Love and Death.

2. Resembling thyme; of, pertaining to, or characteristic of thyme: as, a thymy smell.

Thynnidæ (thin′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Erichson, 1842), < Thynnus + -idæ.] 1. In entom., a curious family of hymenopterous insects, occurring in South America and Australasia, and allied to the Scoliidæ. The female is wingless, and resembles a large ant or some of the wingless Proctotrypidæ, while the male is usually much larger, fully winged, and very active. The last abdominal joint is furnished with chitinous projections, as in some Chrysididæ. More than 50 species are known.

2†. In ichth., a family of scombroid fishes; the tunnies. See Thynnus, 2.

Thynnus (thin′us), n. [NL., < L. thynnus, thunnus, < Gr. θύννος, a tunny: so called from its quick, glancing motions, < θύνειν, θύειν, dart along. Cf. tunny.] 1. In entom., a remarkable genus of hymenopterous insects, typical of the family Thynnidæ. The species are Australian. Fabricius, 1775.—2†. In ichth., a genus of scombroid fishes, so named by Cuvier in 1817; the tunnies. Being preoccupied in entomology, the name was changed by Cuvier in 1829 to Orcynus. See cut under albacore.

Thyone (thī′ō-nē), n. [NL. (Oken, 1815).] 1. The typical genus of Thyonidæ.—2. A genus of crustaceans.

Thyonidæ (thī-on′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Thyone + -idæ.] A family of pedate holothurians, typified by the genus Thyone, having suckers scattered over the surface of the body. They are sometimes called sea-cacti.

thyreoid (thī′rē-oid), a. and n. Same as thyroid.

thyreopalatinus (thī″rē-ō-pal-a-tī′nus), n.; pl. thyreopalatini (-nī). [NL., as thyreo(id) + palatine[2].] Same as palatopharyngeus.

thyreopharyngeus (thī″rē-ō-far-in-jē′us), n.; pl. thyreopharyngei (-ī). [NL., as thyreo(id) + pharynx.] Same as constrictor pharyngis inferior (which see, under constrictor).

Thyreus (thī′rē-us), n. [NL., < Gr. θυρεός, a large oblong shield.] A genus of hawk-moths, of the family Sphingidæ. T. abboti is the Abbot's sphinx, a dull-chocolate or grayish-brown moth with brown and sulphur-yellow hind wings. Its larva feeds upon the grape-vine, and has two marked colorational forms, one green and one brown. The caudal tubercle is polished black with a yellow annulus, and the venter is yellow with pink spots between the prolegs. See cut under sphinx. Now placed in Sphecodina.

Thyridopteryx (thir-i-dop′te-riks), n. [NL. (Stephens, 1835), < Gr. θυρίς (θυριδ-), dim. of θύρα, a door, + πτέρυξ, a wing.] A genus of moths, of the family Psychidæ. The common bagworm of the United States is the larva of T. ephemeræformis. The female is wingless; the male abdomen is robust, and extends for some distance behind the hind wings; and the male antennæ are broadly pectinate almost to the tips. The genus is also represented in Australia. See Psychidæ, and cut under bag-worm.

thyro-aryepiglotticus (thī″rō-ar-i-ep-i-glot′i-kus), n. [NL., as thyro(id) + ary(tenoid) + epiglottis.] Same as thyro-arytenoid muscle (which see, under thyro-arytenoid).

thyro-arytenoid (thī″rō-ar-i-tē′noid), a. [< thyro(id) + arytenoid.] Of or pertaining to the thyroid and arytenoid cartilages.—Thyro-arytenoid folds or ligaments, the vocal cords. (a) Inferior, a strong elastic band passing on either side from the angle of the thyroid cartilage to the anterior angle of the base of the arytenoid cartilage. It is covered with thin mucous membrane, and forms the true vocal cord. (b) Superior, a delicate fibrous band of elastic tissue on either side, passing from the angle of the thyroid cartilage to the anterior surface of the arytenoid cartilage. It is covered with mucous membrane, and forms the so-called false vocal cord.—Thyro-arytenoid muscle, a broad, flat muscle on either side of the larynx, passing from the angle of the alæ of the thyroid cartilage and the cricothyroid membrane, to be inserted into the base and anterior surface of the arytenoid cartilage. It is divisible into an inferior or inner portion, adjacent and parallel to the vocal cord, and a superior and outer portion. This muscle, innervated by the inferior laryngeal nerve, relaxes the vocal cord.

thyro-arytenoideus (thī-rō-ar″i-tē-noi′dē-us), n. [NL.: see thyro-arytenoid.] The thyro-arytenoid muscle.—Thyro-arytenoideus superior. Same as arytenoideus.

thyro-epiglottic (thī-rō-ep-i-glot′ik), a. [< thyro(id) + epiglottis + -ic.] Pertaining to the thyroid cartilage and the epiglottis.—Thyro-epiglottic ligament, the long and narrow ligament connecting the epiglottis with the angle of the thyroid cartilage, just below the median notch of the latter.

thyro-epiglottidean (thī-rō-ep″i-glo-tid′ē-an), a. [< thyro(id) + epiglottis (-id-) + -e-an.] Pertaining to the thyroid cartilage and the epiglottis.—Thyro-epiglottidean muscle, a delicate fasciculus arising from the inner surface of the thyroid cartilage, just external to the origin of the thyro-arytenoid muscle, spreading out on the outer surface of the sacculus laryngis, some fibers extending to the aryteno-epiglottidean fold, others to the margin of the epiglottis. It is innervated by the inferior laryngeal. Also called depressor epiglottidis.

thyro-epiglottideus (thī-rō-ep″i-glo-tid′ē-us), n.; pl. thyro-epiglottidei (-ī). [NL.: see thyro-epiglottidean.] The thyro-epiglottidean muscle (which see, under thyro-epiglottidean).

thyroglottideus (thī″rō-glo-tid′ē-us), n.; pl. thyroglottidei (-ī). Same as thyro-epiglottideus.

thyrohyal (thī-rō-hī′al), n. [< thyro(id) + hy(oid) + -al.] In zoöl. and anat., a bone developed in the third postoral visceral arch of the embryo of higher vertebrates, corresponding to the first branchial arch of fishes and amphibians. (a) In man and other mammals, the greater cornu of the hyoid bone. See first cut under skull[1]. (b) In a bird, sometimes, one of the long horns of the hyoid bone, which curl up behind the skull, and in some woodpeckers even up over the top of the skull to the eye or nostril, consisting each of two pieces properly named ceratobranchial and epibranchial. The ceratobranchials and epibranchials together are badly called the thyrohyals, and in still more popular language the "greater cornua" or "horns" of the hyoid bone.

thyrohyoid (thī-rō-hī′oid), a. and n. [< thyro(id) + hyoid.] I. a. In anat., of or pertaining to the hyoid bone and the thyroid cartilage.—Thyrohyoid arch, the third postoral visceral arch.—Thyrohyoid ligament, a round elastic ligament passing from the superior cornu of the thyroid cartilage to the extremity of the great cornu of the hyoid bone. Also called lateral thyrohyoid ligament, in distinction from the thyrohyoid membrane. See cut under larynx.—Thyrohyoid membrane. See membrane, and cut under larynx.—Thyrohyoid muscle, a muscle extending from the oblique ridge on the outer side of the thyroid cartilage to the great cornu of the hyoid bone: innervated from the hypoglossal. See cut under muscle[1].—Thyrohyoid space, the depressed space between the thyroid cartilage and the hyoid bone in front.

II. n. A small muscle of man and some other animals, apparently a continuation of the sternothyroid, arising from the thyroid cartilage of the larynx and inserted into the hyoid bone. Its action approximates the parts between ★which it extends. See cut under muscle[1].

thyroid (thī′roid), a. and n. [Also, and prop., thyreoid; < Gr. θυρεοειδής, shield-shaped (χόνδρος θυρεοειδής, the thyroid cartilage), < θυρεός, a large oblong shield (< θύρα, door), + εἶδος, form, shape.] I. a. Shield-shaped. Specifically—(a) In anat., noting the largest and principal one of the several cartilages of the larynx; also, noting the obturator foramen and obturator membrane; also, noting the thyroid gland. (b) In zoöl., noting shield-shaped color-markings, or birds having a thyroid marking: as, the thyroid woodpecker, Sphyropicus thyroideus.—Cornua of the thyroid cartilage. See cornu.—Isthmus of the thyroid gland. See isthmus.—Oblique line of the thyroid cartilage. See oblique.—Pyramid of the thyroid gland. See pyramid.—Thyroid artery, either of two arteries distributed to the region of the thyroid cartilage and thyroid body. (a) Superior, a branch of the external carotid, distributed to the sternothyroid, sternohyoid, and omohyoid muscles and the thyroid body, and giving off the hyoid, sternomastoid, laryngeal, and cricothyroid branches. (b) Inferior, a branch of the thyroid axis, passing beneath the great cervical vessels to be distributed to the lower part of the thyroid body, to the scalenus anticus, longus colli, inferior constrictor, and the infrahyoid muscles, and giving off the ascending cervical, inferior laryngeal, tracheal, and esophageal branches.—Thyroid axis. See axis[1].—Thyroid body, the thyroid gland. See below.—Thyroid cartilage, the largest cartilage of the larynx, situated between the hyoid bone and the cricoid cartilage, and composed of two lateral halves, or alæ, continuous in front, where they form the projection known as Adam's apple. It articulates with the epiglottis and the cricoid and other laryngeal cartilages, and affords attachment to the vocal cords. See cut under larynx.—Thyroid dislocation, in surg., dislocation of the head of the thigh-bone or femur into the thyroid or obturator foramen.—Thyroid extract, a preparation of the thyroid gland of the sheep, employed in the treatment of cretinism, myxedema, and other conditions associated with defective functional power of the thyroid gland.—Thyroid foramen. See foramen.—Thyroid ganglion. See ganglion.—Thyroid gland, a large and very vascular body, saddled upon the larynx and upper part of the trachea. The function of the thyroid gland is not wholly understood. It is one of the ductless glands, furnishing an internal secretion which has a necessary, though not definitely determined, part to perform in metabolism and the nutritional processes. Ablation of the thyroid or abolition of its functional activity is followed in infancy by cretinism, in adult life by myxedema. It is the seat of the disease known as bronchocele or goiter, becoming sometimes enormously enlarged.—Thyroid vein. See vein.

II. n. 1. The thyroid cartilage.—2. The thyroid gland.—3. A thyroid artery, vein, or nerve.

thyroidal (thī′roi-dal), a. [< thyroid + -al.] Same as thyroid.

thyroideal (thī-roi′dē-al), a. [< thyroid + -e-al.] Same as thyroid.

thyroidean (thī-roi′dē-an), a. Same as thyroid.

thyroidectomy (thī-roi-dek′tō-mi), n. [< thyroid + Gr. ἐκτομή, a cutting out.] Excision of a part or the whole of the thyroid gland or of the thyroid cartilage.

thyrotomy (thī-rot′ō-mi), n. [< thyro(id) + Gr. -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] In surg., division of the thyroid cartilage.

thyrse (thėrs), n. [= F. thyrse, < L. thyrsus, < Gr. θύρσος, a stalk, stem: see thyrsus.] 1. Same as thyrsus, 1. Herrick, To Live Merrily.—2. In bot., a contracted or ovate panicle, being a mixed or compound form of inflorescence in which the primary ramification is centripetal and the secondary or ultimate is centrifugal. The inflorescence of the horse-chestnut and that of lilac are typical examples. Also thyrsus and cymobotrys. See cut under Æsculus.

3. A small earthenware vessel, of a form resembling that of a pine-cone, especially such a vessel of ancient make.

> From their general resemblance in form to pine cones they have been called thyrses, and are supposed to have been used for holding mercury.
> R. M. Smith, S. K. Handbook, Persian Art, p. 20.

thyrse-flower (thėrs′flou″ėr), n. A plant of the acanthaceous genus Odontonema.

thyrsi, n. Plural of thyrsus.

thyrsiform (thėr′si-fôrm), a. [< L. thyrsus, a thyrsus, + forma, form.] In bot., resembling or having the form of a thyrse.

thyrsoid (thėr′soid), a. [< Gr. θύρσος, a stalk, stem, + εἶδος, form.] In bot., having somewhat the form of a thyrse. Also cymobotryose.

thyrsoidal (thėr′soi-dal), a. [< thyrsoid + -al.] Same as thyrsoid.

thyrsus (thėr′sus), n.; pl. thyrsi (-sī). [< L. thyrsus, < Gr. θύρσος, a stalk or stem, the Dionysiac wand.] 1. One of the most common attributes or emblems of Dionysus (Bacchus) and his thiasus and votaries. It was a staff tipped with an ornament like a pine-cone and sometimes wrapped round with ivy and vine-branches, and appears in various modifications in ancient representations. The bacchantes carried thyrsi in their hands when they celebrated their orgies. Also thyrse.

Thyrsus.— From cast of a vase with archaistic reliefs, in the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston.

2. Same as thyrse, 2.

Thysanocarpus (this″a-nō-kar′pus), n. [NL. (W. J. Hooker, 1829), so called from the pods which hang like tassels; < Gr. θύσανος, a tassel, + καρπός, fruit.] A genus of cruciferous plants, of the tribe Hesperideæ. Characterized by a small one-seeded winged silicle, often with a perforated margin, by accumbent cotyledons, and stamens without appendages. There are about 6 species, natives of California and Oregon. They are slender branching annuals, with pinnatifid radical leaves, and entire, clasping, and sagittate stem-leaves. The racemose white or violet flowers are followed by flattened ovate or roundish pods hanging on filiform pedicels and resembling samaras. A variety of T. curvipes with perforated wing is known as lace pod; and a fringed variety of T. laciniatus, as fringepod (which see).

Thysanopoda (this-ạ-nop′ō-dạ), n. [NL., < Gr. θύσανος, a tassel, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] A genus of crustaceans. T. inermis is a small species which furnishes much of the food of the great blue rorqual, Balænoptera sibbaldi.

thysanopter (this-ạ-nop′tėr), n. [< Thysanoptera.] A thysanopterous insect.

Thysanoptera (this-ạ-nop′tę-rạ), n. pl. [NL. (Haliday, 1836), < Gr. θύσανος, a tassel, + πτερόν, a wing.] In Brauer's system, the seventh order of insects, including only the family Thripidæ (or Thripsidæ), by the older authors (before Haliday) considered as belonging to the Hemiptera. The head ends in a short fleshy beak, but the maxillæ bear two- or three-jointed palpi, and labial palpi are present. The wings are long, narrow, often veinless, and furnished with a long fringe. In the males of some species the wings are wanting. The eggs are cylindric, round at one end and knobbed at the other. The larva and pupa are both active. The feet end in bulbous enlargements, whence the name Physopoda, applied to the group by Burmeister. Two species have been found to be carnivorous, but the majority are plant-feeders. The principal genera are Phlœothrips, Limothrips, and Thrips. See cut under Thrips.

thysanopteran (this-ạ-nop′tę-ran), a. and n. [< thysanopter + -an.] I. a. Thysanopterous.

II. n. A thysanopter.

thysanopterous (this-ạ-nop′tę-rus), a. Of or pertaining to the Thysanoptera.

Thysanotus (this-ạ-nō′tus), n. [NL., so called from the fringed flower-segments; < Gr. θύσανος, a tassel, fringe, + οὖς (ὠτ-), ear.] A name given by Robert Brown in 1810 to Chlamysporum, a genus of liliaceous plants. It is characterized by panicled or fascicled flowers and by a three-celled ovary with two superposed ovules in each cell. The 22 species are natives of Australia, the Philippine Islands, and southern China. One, Chlamysporum chrysantherum, has the range of the entire genus. They grow from a thick, hardened horizontal rhizome, in some species short and mostly replaced by a cluster of fibers or tubers. They produce grass-like radical leaves and a leafless scape, erect, or in one species, C. dichotomum, almost twining. They are known as fringe-lily, and are occasionally cultivated for the peculiar iris-like flowers.

Thysanura (this-ạ-nū′rạ), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1802): see thysanurous.] 1. The lowest order of hexapod insects, including primitive wingless ametabolous forms with simple eyes, living usually in damp places and under stones, and known as springtails and bristletails. In many species the tracheæ are wanting. It comprises in this sense the two suborders Collembola and Cinura. See cuts under Campodea, silverfish, and springtail. 2. An order of less extent (when the Collembola are considered of ordinal rank, as by Lubbock), including only the families Japygidæ, Campodidæ, and Lepismatidæ, and corresponding to the suborder Cinura.

thysanuran (this-ạ-nū′rạn), a. and n. [< Thysanura + -an.] I. a. Thysanurous.

II. n. A member of the Thysanura.

thysanurian (this-ạ-nū′ri-ạn), a. Same as thysanurous. J. H. Comstock.

thysanuriform (this-ạ-nū′ri-fôrm), a. [< NL. Thysanura, q. v., + L. forma, form.] Resembling a thysanuran; thysanurous. S. H. Scudder.

thysanurous (this-ạ-nū′rus), a. [< Gr. θύσανος, a tag, tassel, + οὐρά, tail.] Having long caudal filaments which serve as a spring; springtailed; belonging to the Thysanura, in either sense.

thyself (ᵺhī-self′), pron. [< thy + self. See self.] A pronoun used reflexively for emphasis after, or in place of, thou: as, thou thyself shalt go (that is, thou shalt go and no other).

> Thou alone art unhappy, none so bad as thyself.
> Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 343.
>
> Glad to find thyself so fair,
> Poor child, that waitest for thy love!
> Tennyson, In Memoriam, vi.

ti[1] (tē), n. [Maori.] In Polynesia, the plant Tætsia terminalis, same as ki; in New Zealand, transferred to T. australis and T. indivisa, plants otherwise known as palm-lily. In Hawaii an intoxicating drink is fermented from the ti-root.

ti[2] (tē), n. In solmization. See si.

Ti. In chem., the symbol for titanium.

tia (tē′ạ), n. See Sageretia.

tiao (tyä′ō), n. [Chin.] A string of cash.

> Twenty miles from Peking the big cash are no longer in circulation. Small nominal cash are used, 1,000 of which make a tiao, and 3,000 to 3,500 of which are equal to a tael of silver. Rep. of Sec. of Treasury, 1886, p. 390.

tiar (tiär), n. [< F. tiare, < L. tiara: see tiara.] A tiara. [Poetical.]

> Of beaming sunny rays a golden tiar
> Circled his head. Milton, P. L., iii. 625.

tiara (tī-ā′rạ), n. [Formerly also tiar; < F. tiare = Sp. Pg. It. tiara; < L. tiara, tiaras, < Gr. τιάρα, τιάραϛ, τιήρηϛ, the head-dress of the Persian kings; origin unknown.] 1. An ornament or article of dress with which the ancient Persians covered the head: a kind of turban. As different authors describe it it must have been of different forms. The kings of Persia alone had a right to wear it straight or erect; lords and priests wore it depressed, or turned down on the fore side. Xenophon says the tiara was encompassed with the diadem, at least in ceremonials.

> On his head . . . he ware a Persian tiara, all set down with rows of so rich rubies as they were enough to speak for him that they had to judge of no mean personage.
> Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, v.

2. A cylindrical diadem pointed at the top, tipped with the mound and cross of sovereignty, and surrounded with three crowns, which the Pope wears as a symbol of his threefold sovereignty. Till late in the middle ages tiara was a synonym of mitra, a bishop's miter, and at ceremonies of a purely spiritual character the Pope still wears the miter, not the tiara. Cath. Dict.

Head of Leo XII., wearing the Tiara.

> Gregory XI. assumed the tiara on the last day of 1370. The Century, XL. 592.

3. Figuratively, the papal dignity. —4. A coronet or frontal; an ornament for the head: used loosely for any such ornament considered unusually rich: as, a tiara of brilliants.—5. In her., a bearing representing a tall cap-like or pointed dome surrounded by three crowns, one above the other, and having at the point an orb and cross: it is supposed to represent the crown of the Pope. It is usually all of gold, and this does not need to be expressed in the blazon. Also called Pope's crown, triple crown. 6. In conch.: (a) A miter-shell. (b) [cap.] [NL. (Menke, 1830).] A genus of miter-shells.

tiaraed (tī-ā′rạd), a. [< tiara + -ed[2].] Adorned with a tiara. Imp. Dict.

Tiarella (tī-ạ-rel′ạ), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1751), so called in allusion to some resemblance of the capsule to a tiara or turban; dim. < L. tiara, a cap: see tiara.] A genus of plants, of the family Saxifragaceæ and tribe Saxifrageæ. It is characterized by a one-celled ovary with the placentæ basilar or nearly so. The 5 species are natives of North America, except one in eastern Asia. They are slender erect herbs from a perennial root, bearing a terminal raceme of white flowers and numerous long-petioled leaves, which are chiefly radical, and are undivided as in the eastern, or deeply parted as in the western American species. T. cordifolia, native from Canada to Alabama, is called false miterwort and coolwort. See coolwort.

tib† (tib), n. [Particular uses of Tib, dim. of Tibby, Tibbie, a corruption of the name Isabel. Cf. Jill[2], Jack[1], Tom, etc., similarly used.] 1. A common woman; a paramour.

> Thou art the damned doorkeeper to every > Coistrel that comes enquiring for his Tib.
> Shak., Pericles, iv. 6. 176.

2. The ace of trumps in the game of gleek. See Tom[1], 3.

tib-cat (tib′kat), n. [< Tib, female name, corresponding to Tom in tom-cat.] A she-cat: correlative with tom-cat. Halliwell. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

Tiberian (tī-bē′ri-ạn), a. [< L. Tiberianus, of Tiberius, < Tiberius, Tiberius, a Roman prænomen, prob. connected with Tiberis, the river Tiber.] Of or pertaining to Tiberius, Roman emperor A. D. 14 to 37.

tibert† (tib′ėrt or tī′bėrt), n. [Also tybert; prop. a man's name, the same as Tybalt, < OF. Thibaud, Thibaut, a form of Theobald, G. Dietbolt, etc.] An old name for a cat. Compare tib-cat. "Shakspeare regards Tybalt as the same [as Tibert], hence some of the insulting jokes of Mercutio, who calls Tybalt 'ratcatcher' and 'king of cats.'" (Nares.)

> 'Mongst these Tiberts, who do you think there was?
> B. Jonson, Epigrams, cxxxiii.

tibet, thibet (ti-bet′), n. [Short for Tibet cloth.] 1. Same as Tibet cloth.—2. A woolen stuff usually printed in colors.

Tibetan (tib′e-tạn), a. and n. [Also Thibetan; < Tibet (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Tibet (or Thibet), a dependency of China, situated north of India.

II. n. 1. A native of Tibet.—2. The language of Tibet. It belongs to the monosyllabic or southeastern Asiatic family.

Tibet cloth. [Also Thibet cloth: so called from Tibet in Asia.] 1. A heavy material made wholly or in part of goat's hair.—2. A delicate woolen stuff for women's dresses.

Also tibet.

Tibetian (ti-bē′shiạn), a. and n. [Also Thibetian; < Tibet + -ian.] Same as Tibetan.

tibia (tib′i-ạ), n.; pl. tibiæ, tibias (-ē, -ạz). [= F. tibia, < L. tibia, the shin-bone, the shin, hence a pipe, flute (orig. of bone).] 1. In anat. and zoöl., the inner and usually the larger of the two bones of the crus, or lower leg, extending from the knee to the ankle; the shin-bone of man. This is of prismatic section, with a greatly expanded head which articulates with the femur to the exclusion of the fibula, and a process at the foot which forms the inner malleolus of the ankle. The tibia forms the ankle-joint in all mammals which have one, with or without the fibula, by articulation with the astragalus. In many cases it appears to be the only bone of the lower leg, the fibula being shortened and partly aborted, or even completely ankylosed with the tibia. Much of the tibia is subcutaneous in man, and the character of the broad face and sharp edge of its prismatic section has an ethnological significance. See platycnemic, and cuts under crus, digitigrade, Equidæ, fibula, Ornithoscelida, Plantigrada, Plesiosaurus, tarsus, and skeleton, with several others cited under the last-named word. 2. In ornith., the tibiotarsus. In some birds, as the loon, the tibia develops an immense apophysis which projects far above the knee-joint. See also cuts under Dromæus and tibiotarsus.—3. That segment of the hind limb which extends from the knee to the ankle; the part of the leg corresponding to the extent of the tibia; the crus; the drumstick of a fowl: used especially in ornithology.—4. In entom., the fourth and penultimate joint of the leg, between the femur and the tarsus. It is often enlarged, as in saltatorial forms, especially in connection with such incrassate femora as those of grasshoppers, etc. See cuts under corbiculum and coxa.

tb, tibia; f, distal end of femur; fi, fibula; cn, cnemial process, forming apophysis above knee-joint; tc, tibial condyles.

5. An ancient variety of flageolet, or direct flute, single or double. See flute[1], 1 (a).

> The same variety of strings may be observed on their harps, and of stops on their Tibiæ.
> Addison, Remarks on Italy (Works, ed. Bohn, I. 466).

Clypeate, digitate, foliaceous, palmate tibiæ. See the adjectives.—Oblique line of the tibia. See oblique.—Pronator tibiæ. See peroneotibial, 2.—Serrate tibiæ. See serrate.—Spines of the tibia. See spine.

tibial (tib′i-ạl), a. and n. [= F. tibial, < L. tibialis, < tibia, the shin-bone, a pipe: see tibia.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the tibia, shin-bone, or inner bone of the lower leg or crus: as, the tibial crest; tibial muscles; tibial arteries.—2. Of or pertaining to the crus, or lower leg (see tibia, 3): as, tibial feathers; tibial scutella.—3. Of or pertaining to the fourth segment of the leg of an insect: as, tibial hairs.—4. Of or pertaining to the pipe or flute called tibia.—Anterior tibial nerve, a branch of the peroneal nerve lying in front of the interosseous membrane. It supplies the tibialis anticus, the extensor longus digitorum, extensor longus pollicis, extensor brevis digitorum, and with sensory fibers the ankle-joint and the skin on the dorsal surface of contiguous sides of the first and second toes.—Posterior tibial nerve, the continuation of the popliteal nerve down the back of the leg beneath the muscles of the calf. After supplying the muscles of the back of the leg, except the popliteus, it divides at the inner side of the ankle into the internal and external plantar.—Tibial apophysis, in ornith., a long process from the upper end of the tibia in some birds. See tibia, 2.—Tibial arteries, branches resulting from the bifurcation of the popliteal artery, especially the two main trunks. (a) The anterior extends along the anterior surface of the interosseous membrane, after passing through the aperture in the upper part of that membrane, as far as the bend of the ankle, where it becomes the dorsal artery of the foot. It supplies the muscles of the anterior part of the leg, and gives off the anterior and posterior tibial recurrent arteries and the malleolar arteries. (b) The posterior continues down between the superficial and deep muscles of the back of the leg, giving off muscular, cutaneous, and internal malleolar branches, and the medullary and peroneal arteries, and bifurcating near the heel into the internal and external plantar arteries.—Tibial crest. See crista tibiæ, under crista.—Tibial epiphyses, tibial condyles, in ornith., that part of the tarsus which is to be or has been ankylosed with the tibia proper. See cuts under tibia and tibiotarsus.—Tibial trochlea, in ornith., a bridge of bone across the lower end of the tibiotarsus, between its condyles, confining certain tendons which play beneath it as if in a pulley.

II. n. 1. A structure connected with the tibia; especially, such a muscle, artery, or nerve.—2. The fifth joint of a spider's leg, being the second of the two which form the shank.

tibiale (tib-i-ā′lē), n.; pl. tibialia (-li-ạ). [NL., neut. of L. tibialis: see tibial.] A bone of the tarsus, the inner one of the proximal row of tarsal bones on the tibial side of the tarsus, in especial relation with the tibia, as is the astragalus, which is by some supposed to be the tibiale, while others consider that the astragalus, besides representing the tibiale, includes also the bone called intermedium. See cuts under Ichthyosauria, Plesiosaurus, and tarsus.

tibialis (tib-i-ā'lis), n.; pl. tibiales (-lēz). [NL. (sc. musculus): see tibial.] One of several muscles of the crus, or lower leg, and foot, in relation with the tibia.—Tibialis anticus, a fusiform muscle arising chiefly from the external surface of the shaft of the tibia, and inserted mostly into the internal cuneiform. Also called anterior tibial muscle and hippicus. See cut under muscle[1].—Tibialis posticus, a muscle arising chiefly from the posterior surface of the tibia and the inner surface of the fibula, and inserted chiefly into the internal cuneiform and scaphoid. Also called nauticus and posterior tibial muscle. See cut under muscle[1].—Tibialis secundus, an occasional muscle of man, passing from the back of the tibia to the ligament of the ankle-joint.

tibicen (ti-bī'sen), n. [L., < tibia, a flute, + canere, sing: see tibia and chant.] In anc. music, a flute-player.

tibicinate (ti-bis'i-nāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. tibicinated, ppr. tibicinating. [< LL. tibicinatus, pp. of tibicinare, play on the flute, < L. tibicen (tibicin-), a flute-player: see tibicen.] To play on a flute. [Rare.]

tibiofascialis (tib″i-ō-fas-i-ā'lis), n.; pl. tibiofasciales (-lēz). [NL., < tibia + fascia, fascia.] A small occasional muscle of man, upon the lower part of the tibia.

tibiofemoral (tib″i-ō-fem'ō-ral), a. [< tibia + femur (femor-) + -al.] Common to the tibia and the femur; femorotibial.—Tibiofemoral index, the ratio of the length of the tibia to that of the femur.

tibiofibular (tib″i-ō-fib'ū-lăr), a. [< tibia + fibula + -ar.] Of or pertaining to the tibia and the fibula: as, the tibiofibular articulations. Also tibioperoneal.

tibiometatarsal (tib″i-ō-met-a-tär'sal), a. [< tibia + metatarsus + -al.] In ornith., of or pertaining to the tibia and the metatarsus: as, the ankle-joint of a bird is apparently tibiometatarsal, but in reality mediotarsal.

tibioperoneal (tib″i-ō-per-ō-nē'al), a. [< tibia + peroneum + -al.] Same as tibiofibular.

tibiotarsal (tib″i-ō-tär'sal), a. [< tibia + tarsus + -al.] 1. In zoöl. and anat., of or pertaining to the tibia and the tarsus: as, tibiotarsal ligaments.—2. In entom., pertaining or common to the tibia and the tarsus of an insect's leg: as, a tibiotarsal brush of hairs.

Also tarsotibial.

Tibiotarsal articulation, the ankle-joint of any mammal: opposed to mediotarsal or tarsotarsal articulation.—Tibiotarsal ligaments, ligaments running from the tibia to the astragalus: an anterior and a posterior are distinguished in man.

tibiotarsus (tib″i-ō-tär'sus), n.; pl. tibiotarsi (-sī). [NL., < tibia + tarsus.] In ornith., the tibia, which in a bird consists of a tibia proper with an epiphysis at its distal end, constituted by the proximal portion of the tarsus, in adult life forming the so-called condyles of the tibia.

An upper tarsal bone, or series of tarsal bones, fuses with the lower end of the tibia, making this leg-bone really a tibio-tarsus; and similarly, a lower bone or set of tarsal bones fuses with the upper end of the metatarsus, making this bone a tarso-metatarsus.

Coues, Key N. A. Birds, p. 120.

Tibiotarsus of a Bird (common fowl), showing the formation of the tibial malleoli by As, the astragalus, a bone of the tarsus; Cn, cnemial process of tibia; T, tibia; F, fibula. A, right tibia, external lateral view; B, right tibia, front view; C, end of left tibia, external lateral view; D, end of left tibia, front view.

Tibouchina (tib-ō-kī'nä), n. [NL. (Aublet, 1775), from the name in Guiana.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, type of the tribe Tibouchineæ in the family Melastomaceæ. It is characterized by flowers with a hirsute or chaffy calyx; five obovate petals, usually unequal and retuse; ten stamens, equal or nearly so, and with slender equal arcuate anthers opening by a small pore; and a five-celled ovary, wholly or mostly superior, with the summit hairy or bristly. There are 190 species, natives of tropical America, especially of Brazil. They are shrubs, or rarely herbs, sometimes climbers, and commonly rough-hairy. They usually bear large, coriaceous, entire, and three- to seven-nerved leaves, and conspicuous violet or purple flowers borne in much-branched, repeatedly three-forked panicles. Many species known as spider-flower (which see) are cultivated for their handsome flowers, often under the former generic names Pleroma and Lasiandra. T. laxa is the Peruvian glory-bush.

Tibouchineæ (tib-ō-kin'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Baillon, 1880), < Tibouchina + -eæ.] A tribe of plants, of the family Melastomaceæ, including ★22 genera, of which Tibouchina is the type.

tic[1] (tik), n. [Formerly tick (see tick[5]); < F. tic (OF. also ticq, ticquet), a twitching, a disease of horses; esp. in the phrase tic douloureux, 'painful twitching,' facial neuralgia; cf. tic, a vicious habit, = It. ticchio, a ridiculous habit, whim, caprice; origin uncertain.] A habitual spasmodic contraction of certain muscles, especially of the face; twitching; vellication: especially applied to tic-douloureux, or facial neuralgia. See tic-douloureux.

tic[2], tic-bird (tik, tik'bėrd), n. [Appar. imitative. Cf. Toccus, tock, tok.] An African beef-eater or ox-pecker; an ox-bird. See cuts under Buphaga and Textor.

tical (tik'al or tī'kal), n. [Also teecal, tecul; < British Burmese tikāl, a word of obscure origin, the true Burmese word being kyat, and the Siamese word bat.] A weight now used in Burma and Siam, and formerly in many other places in the Indies, equal to about 230 grains troy; also, a current silver coin of Siam, worth about 37 United States cents.

tic-douloureux (tik'dö-lö-rė'), n. [F.: tic, a twitching; douloureux, painful: see tic[1] and dolorous.] A severe form of facial neuralgia; prosopalgia. It is characterized by a sudden attack of very acute pain, attended with convulsive twitchings of the muscles of the face, and continuing from a few minutes to several hours. Often called simply tic.

tice† (tīs), v. t. [< ME. tisen, tysen, < OF. tiser, entice: see entice, of which E. tice is in part an aphetic form.] To entice; seduce.

Fro thens-forth she tysed euer Merlin to come speke with hir. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 418.

What strong enchantments tice my yielding soul! Marlowe, Tamburlaine, I., i. 11.

Wall-creeper (Tichodroma muraria).

tichodrome (tī'kō-drōm), n. A bird of the genus Tichodroma.

Tichodrominæ (tī″kō-drō-mī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Tichodroma + -inæ.] A subfamily of Certhiidæ, or creepers, represented by the genus Tichodroma; the wall-creepers.

tichorhine (tī'kō-rin), a. and n. [< Gr. τεῖχος, wall, + ῥίς (ῥιν-), nose.] I. a. Having an ossified nasal septum: specifying a rhinoceros. See II. Owen, Palæontology, p. 366.

II. n. A fossil rhinoceros (Rhinoceros tichorhinus), so called from the median vertical bony septum or wall which supports the nose. Owen.

tick[1] (tik), v. [Also dial. tig; < ME. ticken*, tikken = D. tikken = LG. tikken, > G. ticken, touch lightly, pat; prob. a secondary form of MD. tucken, tocken, etc., touch (whence ult. E. touch: see touch), or else ult. a secondary form of take, or of the form represented by Goth. tēkan, touch: see take, and cf. tag[2]. The word has a diminutive effect, and with ref. to sound is regarded as imitative (cf. tick-tack[1], tick-tock). Hence tick[1], n. Cf. tickle.] I. intrans. 1. To touch or tap something lightly, or with a small sharp sound; tap slightly, as a bird when picking up its food; peck.—2. To emit a slight recurring click, like that of a watch or clock.

On one wall ticked a clock without a case, its weights dangling to the floor. S. Judd, Margaret, ii. 8.

At night when the doors are shut,
And the wood-worm picks,
And the death-watch ticks.
Browning, Mesmerism.

To tick and toy†, to indulge in playful love-pats, or the like; dally.

Stand not ticking and toying at the branches, . . . but strike at the root. Latimer, Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1550.

Unto her repaire,
Where her flocks are feeding.
Sit and tick and toy,
Till set be the sunne.
England's Helicon (1614). (Nares.)

II. trans. 1. To touch lightly, as in the game of tag or tig; tag. [Obsolete or dialectal.]—2. To place a dot on, over, or against; mark with or as with a tick or dot: as, to tick one's i's in writing; to set a dot against, as in checking off the items in a list or catalogue: check by writing down a small mark: generally with off.

★Magnetic tick. See magnetic.

tick[2] (tik), n. [< ME. tike, tyke, teke, < AS. tica* or ticu* (found once as ticia, appar. an error for tiica*, i. e. tīca*, or for ticca*) = MD. teke, teecke, D. teekt = MLG. LG. teke = MHG. zeche, G. zecke (cf. F. tique = It. zecca, < Teut.), a tick. Cf. Armenian tiz, tick.] 1. One of many different kinds of mites or acarines which are external parasites of various animals, including man. (a) A mite of the family Ixodidæ, and especially of the genus Ixodes; a wood-tick; a dog-tick; a cattle-tick. There are many species, found in the woods and fields, capable of independent existence, but liable to fasten upon dogs, cattle, etc., forming temporary parasites. They bury the head in the skin of the host, and hang there sucking the blood until they swell up enormously, lose their hold, and drop off. They are annoying, but not poisonous or especially dangerous. The cattle-tick is Boöphilus bovis; the seed-tick is the young form of the same species; the dog-tick is Ixodes ricinus. See Ixodes, and cut under Acarida. (b) A mite of the spurious family Leptidæ; a harvest-tick, -mite, or -bug. See harvest-tick (with cut). Hence—2. With a qualifying term, a member of the dipterous family Hippoboscidæ. Those of the genus Ornithomyia are bird-ticks; the sheep-tick is Melophagus ovinus (see cut under sheep-tick); the horse-tick is Hippobosca equina. The bat-ticks belong to the related dipterous family Nycteribiidæ.

3. The tick-bean.—Persian tick. See Persian and Argas.

tick[3] (tik), n. [Early mod. E. also teke, tike; < ME. teke = MD. tijcke, D. tijk = OHG. ziecha, MHG. ticker[1] (tik'ėr), n. [< tick[1] + -er[1].] Something which ticks, or makes a slight repeated sound. Specifically —(a) A watch. [Slang.]

"If you don't take fogles and tickers— . . . If you don't take pocket-hankechers and watches," said the Dodger, reducing his conversation to the level of Oliver's capacity, "some other cove will."
Dickens, Oliver Twist, xviii.

(b) A telegraphic instrument, especially a stock indicator (which see, under indicator). [Colloq.]

Ticker. A colloquial name for a stock or market report automatic printing telegraph, which prints its quotations and messages on a long tape.
Sloane, Standard Electrical Dictionary.

ticker[2]† (tik'ėr), n. [< tick[5] + -er[1].] A cribbing horse.

★ticket (tik'et), n. [< ME. ticket, < OF. estiquet, etiquet*, m., estiquette, etiquette, f., a bill, note, label, ticket, esp. a bill stuck up on a gate or wall as a public notice, F. étiquette, f., a label, ticket, etiquette, < MHG. G. stecken, stick: see stick[2]. Cf. etiquette.] 1. A written or printed card or slip of paper affixed to something to indicate its nature, contents, or price, or to give other notice or information; a label.

He [Samuel Collins] constantly read his lectures twice a week for above forty years, giving notice of the time to his auditors in a ticket on the school doors.
Fuller, Worthies, Buckinghamshire, I. 209.

2†. A bill or account stuck up; a score; hence, to take goods on or upon ticket, to buy on credit. Now contracted to tick. See tick[4], n.

Come, neighbours, upon this good news let 's chop up to my host Snego's; he'll be glad to hear of it too. I am resolved to build no more sconces, but to pay my old tickets. Randolph, Hey for Honesty, ii. 6.

No matter whether . . . you have money or no; you may swim in twenty of their boats over the river upon ticket: Marry; when silver comes in, remember to pay treble their fare. Dekker, Gull's Hornbook, p. 145.

3. A slip of paper or cardboard on which a memorandum, notice, order, acknowledgment, or the like is written or printed; a card or slip of paper serving as a token or evidence of a right or of a debt: as, a theater-ticket; a railway-ticket; a lottery-ticket; a pawn-ticket. The use of tickets is chiefly in contracts of a class such as are made in large numbers, with many persons, but all on the same terms. There has been much discussion as to whether a ticket is a contract. Rightly viewed, it is the token of a contract, and may or may not embody in the inscription terms of the contract; but when it does so, other terms may be implied by law, or expressly agreed on outside of its contents by the parties—the object of stating upon the ticket anything more than what is necessary to its use as a token being usually, if not always, merely to restrict some liability which the law would otherwise imply, not to embody the whole agreement.

The porter . . . there gave me a little ticket under his hand as a kind of warrant for mine entertainement in mine Inne. Coryat, Crudities, I. 57.

They send the Beadle with a List of such Friends and Relations as they have a Mind to invite [to the funeral]; and sometimes they have printed Tickets, which they leave at their Houses.
Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [I. 55.

4†. A visiting-card.

"A ticket?" repeated Cecilia. "Does Lady Nyland only admit her company with tickets?" "O Lord!" cried Miss Larolles, laughing immoderately. "Don't you know what I mean? Why, a ticket is only a visiting-card with a name upon it; but we all call them tickets now."
Miss Burney, Cecilia, i. 3.

Poor dear Mrs. Jones . . . still calls on the ladies of your family, and slips her husband's ticket upon the hall table. Thackeray, Philip, xiii.

5. A list of candidates nominated or put forward by a party, faction, etc., for election: as, the Democratic ticket; the Prohibition ticket; the regular and opposition tickets in the elections of a club.—6. In certain mining districts of England and Wales, a tender from a smelter for a lot of ore offered by a miner, in accordance with the peculiar method of sale called ticketing or by ticket. See the quotation.

In Cornwall, Cardiganshire, and partly in Denbighshire, the Isle of Man, and elsewhere, each Mine sends samples of its ore to the Smelters in various localities, along with a notice to the effect that tenders or tickets will be received, up to a certain day, on which they will be opened and the highest offer accepted.
Percy, Metallurgy of Lead, p. 496.

Allotment ticket. See allotment note, under allotment. —Benefit ticket. See benefit.— Commutation ticket. See commutation-ticket.— Coupon ticket. See coupon.— General ticket, in elections to representative bodies, a list of candidates so composed as to offer to the voters of a large political division (as a State) a number of candidates for common membership equal to the entire representation to which such division is entitled; a ticket not arranged with a view to the representation of territorial subdivisions by a single representative each.

There is another cause that has greatly contributed to place the control of the presidential elections in the hands of those who hold or seek office. I allude to what is called the general ticket system; which has become, with the exception of a single state, the universal mode of appointing electors to choose the President and Vice-President. Calhoun, Works, I. 370.

Limited ticket, in railroad usage, a ticket not giving the holder all the privileges given by an ordinary ticket, as, for instance, one limited to a trip commenced on a specified day or by a particular train, or excluding the right to break the journey by stopping on the way and taking a later train.— Mileage ticket, a ticket issued by a carrier of passengers, entitling the holder to be carried a given number of miles.— Scratched ticket, a voting-ticket or ballot on which some change has been made by erasure or substitution.— Season ticket, a ticket or pass entitling the holder to certain privileges for the season, or for a specified period: as, a season ticket entitling one to travel at pleasure between specified places on a line of railway; a season ticket to an art-gallery or place of amusement. —Split ticket, in politics, a ticket or ballot made up of the names of candidates from two or more tickets or parties.— Straight ticket, in politics, a ticket bearing the names of the regular nominees of a party or faction, and no other.— The ticket, the right or correct thing. [Colloq. or slang.]

She 's very handsome and she 's very finely dressed, only somehow she 's not — she 's not the ticket, you see.
Thackeray, Newcomes, vii.

That 's about the ticket in this country.
Trollope, Orley Farm, lxvii.

Through ticket. See through[1].— Ticket of leave, a permit issued sometimes in Great Britain and her colonies to a prisoner or convict who has served a part of his time and who may be intrusted with his liberty under certain restrictions, such as reporting to the police at certain specified intervals, sleeping in the place given to the police as his abode, leading an honest life, etc.

When the convicts were sent out to the colony they received each in turn, after a certain period of penal probation, a conditional freedom: in other words, a ticket of leave. J. McCarthy, Hist. Own Times, xxxi.

Ticket-of-leave man, a convict who has received a ticket of leave.— To run ahead of the (or one's) ticket, in U. S. politics, to receive a larger vote than the average vote polled by one's associates on the same electoral ticket. Similarly, to run behind the ticket is to receive less than such an average vote.

ticket (tik'et), v. t. [< ticket, n.] 1. To put a ticket or label on; distinguish by affixing a ticket; label.

Writing was to him little more than an auxiliary to natural history; a way of ticketing specimens, not of expressing thoughts. Mrs. Gaskell, Mary Barton, xxxiii.

I am so far from hating the Dodsons myself that I am rather aghast to find them ticketed with such very ugly adjectives. George Eliot, in Cross, II. x.

For myself it matters little whether I be ticketed as a High, a Low, or a Broad Churchman.
Nineteenth Century, XXVI. 825.

2. To furnish with a ticket: as, to ticket a passenger to California. [Colloq., U. S.]

ticket-day (tik'et-dā), n. The day before the settling or paying day on the stock-exchange, when the tickets containing the names of the actual purchasers are given in by one stock-broker to another.

ticket-holder (tik'et-hōl″dėr), n. 1. A device for attaching a tag, card, etc., to a trunk, box, or parcel.—2. In a railway sleeping-car, a metal clip or spring fastened to the side of a berth, to hold the tickets of the occupant.—3. A device for attaching a railroad-ticket to the hat or coat of a passenger to keep it in view. —4. One who holds a ticket, as for admission to an exhibition or for other privilege.

ticketing (tik'et-ing), n. [Verbal n. of ticket, v.] 1. The act or practice of affixing tickets to anything, or of giving tickets for it: as, the ticketing of goods or of passengers.— 2. The selling of ore by ticket. See ticket, n., 6.

ticket-night (tik'et-nīt), n. A benefit at a theater or other place of public entertainment the proceeds of which are divided among several beneficiaries, each of whom receives an amount equal in value to the tickets individually sold, less an equal share of the incidental expenses.

ticket-porter (tik'et-pōr″tėr), n. A licensed porter who wears a badge or ticket, by which he may be identified. [Great Britain.]

ticket-punch (tik'et-punch), n. A hand-punch for stamping or canceling railroad, theater, or other tickets. The most common form cuts a hole in the ticket, the shape of the hole indicating a number, letter, or some other device. In some forms the blank stamped out of the ticket is retained in a receptacle attached to the punch, an alarm-bell is rung, or a registering device is set in motion to record the number of tickets punched.

ticket-writer (tik'et-rī″tėr), n. One who writes or paints show-cards for shop-windows, etc.

tick-hole (tik'hōl), n. A drusy cavity or empty space in a lode: same as vug in Cornwall. Farey. [Derbyshire, Eng.]

ticking[1] (tik'ing), n. [Verbal n. of tick[1], v.] The act of making ticks, or slight repeated sounds; the sounds themselves: as, the ticking of the clock.

ticking[2] (tik'ing), n. [< tick[3] + -ing[1].] A strong material of linen or cotton, twilled-woven, and usually in stripes of blue or pink with white. It is used especially for bedticks, whence the name, and also for awnings and similar purposes, and in recent times as a foundation for embroidery, the stripes facilitating the working of certain designs. Also ticken.

Maggie had on a simple brown calico dress and an apron of blue ticking. G. W. Cable, Stories of Louisiana, ii.

ticking-work (tik'ing-wėrk), n. A kind of embroidery done upon ticking as a background, the stripes of the material being utilized in the ★design.

tickle (tik'l), v.; pret. and pp. tickled, ppr. tickling. [Early mod. E. also tickle; < ME. tiklen, tikelen, freq. of tikken, E. tick, touch lightly: see tick[1]. Cf. G. dial. zicklen, excite, stir up. Cf. tickle, a. Not, as often supposed, a transposed form of kittle[1].] I. trans. 1. To tease with repeated light touches in some sensitive part, so as to excite the nerves, thereby producing a peculiar thrilling sensation which commonly results in spasmodic laughter, or, if too long continued, in a convulsion; titillate.

If you tickle us do we not laugh?
Shak., M. of V., iii. 1. 68.

Their Stings are not strong enough to enter a Man's Skin; but, if disturbed, they will fly at one as furiously as the great Bees, and will tickle, but cannot hurt you.
Dampier, Voyages, II. ii. 112.

We were informed of a very particular manner of catching them by encompassing them with a net, and men go into the water, tickle them on the belly, and so get them ashoar. Pococke, Description of the East, II. ii. 252.

He is playful so out of season that he reminds me of a young lady I saw at Sta. Maria Novella, who at one moment crossed herself, and at the next tickled her companion. Landor, Imag. Conv., Southey and Landor, ii.

2. To touch, affect, or excite agreeably; gratify; please or amuse by gentle appeals to one's imagination, sense of humor, vanity, or the like.

Whereat her Maiestie laughed as she had bene tickled, and all the rest of the company, although very graciously (as her manner is) she gaue him great thankes.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 217.

The first view did even . . . tickle my senses with inward joy. Coryat, Crudities, I. 110.

How dost like him? art not rapt, art not tickled now?
B. Jonson, Poetaster, iii. 1.

Pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw.
Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 276.

My father was hugely tickled with the subtleties of these learned discourses. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iv. 31.

The notion of the lion couchant with his currant eyes being hoisted up to the place of honor on a mantle-piece tickled my hysterical fancy. Mrs. Gaskell, Cranford, xiv.

His spice is of so keen a flavor that it tickles the coarsest palate. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 13.

Secret laughter tickled all my soul.
Tennyson, Princess, iv.

3. To take, move, or produce by touching lightly. [Rare.]

Nimble Tom, surnamed the Tup,
For his pipe without a peer,
And could tickle Trenchmore up,
As 'twould joy your heart to hear.
Drayton, Shepherd's Sirena.

The cunning old pug . . . took puss's two foots,
And so out o' th' embers he tickled his nuts.
Byrom, To R. L., Esquire.

II. intrans. 1. To feel titillation: as, his foot tickled.—2. To tingle pleasantly; thrill with gratification or amusement.

Who, seeing him, with secret joy therefore Did tickle inwardly in everie vaine.
Spenser, Muiopotmos, l. 394.

What opinion will the managing of this affair bring to my wisdom! my invention tickles with apprehension on't.
Beau. and Fl., Thierry and Theodoret, iii. 2.

In trifling works of fancy, wits agree
That nothing tickles like a simile.
Garrick, quoted in W. Cooke's Memoirs of S. Foote, I. 107.

3. To have an impatient or uneasy desire to do or to get something; itch; tingle.

The fingers of the Atheniens ticled to aide and succour Harpalus. Udall, tr. of Apophthegms of Erasmus, p. 318.

I am glad the silly man is weake and old;
By heauen, my fingers tickle at his gold.
Heywood, Four Prentises of London (Works, II. 185).

4. To produce the sensation of titillation, or the slight nervous excitement of a light touch on some sensitive part.

A feather or a rush drawn along the lip or cheek doth tickle, whereas a thing more obtuse . . . doth not.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 766.

tickle† (tik'l), a. [Early mod. E. also ticle; < ME. tickle, tikel, tikil; < tickle, v. Not, as often supposed, a transposed form of kittle[1], a.] Easily moved; unsteady; unstable; inconstant.

This world is now ful tikel sikerly.
Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 242.

For some men be tickle of tongue,
And play the blabs by kynde.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 101.

So ticle be the termes of mortall state.
Spenser, F. Q., III. iv. 28.

I have set her heart upon as tickle a pin as the needle of a dial, that will never let it rest till it be in the right position. Chapman, Widow's Tears, ii. 2.

But these wives, sir, are such tickle
Things, not one hardly staid amongst a thousand.
Shirley, The Brothers, ii. 1.

tickle (tik'l), n. [< tickle, v.] A light teasing touch in some sensitive part; a gentle tickling act or action.

I gave her [a child] a little tickle; and verily she began to laugh. R. D. Blackmore, Maid of Sker, v.

tickle-brain† (tik'l-brān), n. One who has a tickle or unsteady brain, as one intoxicated.

Peace, good pint-pot; peace, good tickle-brain.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 4. 438.

tickle-footed† (tik'l-fūt″ed), a. Uncertain; inconstant; slippery.

You were ever tickle-footed.
Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, v.

tickle-grass (tik'l-gràs), n. The hair-grass or thin-grass, Agrostis hyemalis; also, one of similar grasses, as the old-witch grass, Panicum capillare.

ticklenburg† (tik'len-berg), n. [Origin obscure.] A coarse mixed linen fabric made for the West India market. Simmonds.

tickleness† (tik'l-nes), n. [< ME. tikelnesse; < tickle, a., + -ness.] Unsteadiness; instability; uncertainty.

Hord hath hate and clymbynge tikelnesse.
Chaucer, Truth, l. 3.

tickler (tik'lėr), n. [< tickle + -er[1].] 1. One who or that which tickles or pleases.—2. Something which puzzles or perplexes; something difficult to understand or answer; a puzzle. [Colloq.]—3. A narrow difficult passage or strait on the coast of Newfoundland.—4. A memorandum-book kept to tickle or refresh the memory; specifically, a book used by bankers, showing, in the order of their maturity, notes and debts receivable by the bank. There is usually a tickler for each month of the year. [Colloq.]

The ticklers, showing in detail debts receivable in the future, those past due, and also the overdrafts, require explanation by the president. Harper's Mag., LXXX. 464.

5. A small bottle containing about half a pint (of spirits), or just enough to "tickle"; also, a dram of whisky or brandy. [Colloq.]

Whiskey was sold and drunk without screens or scruples. It was not usually bought by the drink, but by the tickler. Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 388.

It is too cold to work, but it is not too cold to sit on a fence chewing, with a tickler of whisky handy.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 77.

6. A small weapon carried on the person, as a pistol or a knife. [Slang, southern and western U. S.]—7. A strap with which to whip.—8. A prong used by coopers to extract bungs from casks.—9. A large longicorn beetle, Monohammus titillator, with extremely long antennæ: so called from the habit it has (in common with most of the Cerambycidæ) of gently touching now and then the surface on which it walks with the tips of its long antennæ. T. W. Harris.

tickling (tik'ling), n. [Verbal n. of tickle, v.] 1. The act of one who tickles.—2. The sensation produced by the teasing of slight touches on some sensitive part, or the analogous sensation produced on the mind, the imagination, vanity, or the like by the presentation of something pleasing, gratifying, ludicrous, etc.

Delight hath a joy in it, either permanent or present. Laughter hath onely a scornful tickling.
Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

3. The act of stirring lightly: said humorously of the soil.

Vegetable-gardens require only a tickling to bear profusely. The Critic, XV. 192.

ticklish (tik'lish), a. [< tickle + -ish[1].] 1. Easily moved or unbalanced; unsteady; unstable; uncertain; inconstant.

These Words, being considered of by the Judges, seemed to express a ticklish Hold of Loyalty.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 242.

I think our office stands on very ticklish terms, the Parliament likely to sit shortly, and likely to be asked more money, and we be able to give a very bad account of the expence and of what we have done with what they did give before. Pepys, Diary, II. 364.

We embarked in a little ticklish, incommodious punt, such as I have seen used on the Thames by worthy citizens bobbing for eels. B. Hall, Travels in N. A., I. 148.

2. Dubious; difficult; critical.

Princes had need, in tender matter and ticklish time, to beware what they say.
Bacon, Seditions and Troubles (ed. 1887).

The doctor would by no means let him blood, which, nevertheless, some hold might have saved his life; but it is a ticklish point. Court and Times of Charles I., I. 318.

Politics in those days were ticklish subjects to meddle with, even in the most private company.
Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xiv.

Not far from here [Eden Harbour] are the English Narrows, a passage which is a ticklish but interesting piece of navigation. Lady Brassey, Voyage of Sunbeam, I. ix.

3. Easily tickled; tickly; touchy: as, the sole of the foot is very ticklish; a ticklish person.

We see also that the palme of the hand, though it hath as thin a skin as the other parts mentioned, yet is not ticklish, because it is accustomed to be touched.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 766.

He 's as ticklish as can be. I love to torment the confounded toad; let you and I tickle him.
Wycherley, Country Wife, iv. 3.

ticklishly (tik'lish-li), adv. In a ticklish manner.

ticklishness (tik'lish-nes), n. Ticklish character or quality. (a) The condition of being easily tickled.

We know by the ticklishness of the soles what a multitude of fine nervous fibres terminate in them.
G. Cheyne, Essay on Regimen, p. 200. (Latham.)

(b) Unsteady, unstable, or insecure state or character: as, the ticklishness of a seat or of a boat. (c) Difficulty; difficult, perplexing, or critical character or state: as, the ticklishness of some undertaking.

tickly (tik'li), a. [< tickle + -y[1].] Same as ticklish.

tickseed (tik'sēd), n. 1. A plant of the genus Coreopsis.—2. A plant of the genus Corispermum, usually named bug-seed.—3. Same as tick-trefoil.—Tickseed sunflower, Bidens trichosperma, a species with conspicuous golden-yellow rays, found in the eastern and interior United States.

tick-tack[1] (tik'tak), n. [Cf. MD. ticktacken, play tick-tack, prob. orig. 'tick' or 'click,' LG. tikktakken, touch lightly; a varied reduplication of tick[1], n. Cf. tick-tack[2] and tick-tock.] 1. A pulsating sound like that made by a clock or watch; a ticking.—2. Specifically, the sound of the beating of the heart.

The stethoscope revealed the existence of no difficulty, . . . and the normal tick-tack of the heart beat with healthy precision. J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 136.

3. A device employed in playing certain practical jokes, consisting of a small weight so fastened that one at a distance can, by pulling a string, cause the weight to tap against the house or window. [U. S.] tick-tack[1] (tik'tak), adv. [An elliptical use of tick-tack[1], n.] With a sound resembling the beating of a watch.

tick-tack[2] (tik'tak), n. [= F. tic-tac = Pg. tiquetaque = Dan. tiktak, prob. < MD. ticktack*, D. tiktak, tick-tack; prob. so called from the clicking noise made by the pieces, < MD. ticktacken, D. tiktakken, play tick-tack; prob. orig. 'tick' or 'click': see tick-tack[1]. Hence, by variation, trick-track, F. trictrac.] A complicated kind of backgammon, played both with men and with pegs. Compare trick-track, and see the third quotation below.

He'll play
At fayles and tick-tack.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iii. 2.

From hence we went to the Groom Porters, where they were a Labouring like so many Anchor Smiths at the Oake, Back Gammon, Tick-Tack, Irish, Basset, and throwing of Mains. Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of [Queen Anne, II. 111.

This is the plain game of tick-tack, which is so called from "touch and take," for if you touch a man you must play him, though to your loss.
Compleat Gamester, p. 113. (Nares.) tick-tock (tik'tok), n. [An imitative reduplication of tick[1]. Cf. tick[1].] The slow recurrent ticking of a tall clock. [Colloq.]

tick-trefoil (tik'trē″foil), n. A plant of the genus Meibomia: so named from the trifoliate leaves and the joints of the pods, which are adhesive like ticks. Several species have attracted attention in the southern United States as promising fodder and soiling plants. Also tickseed.

tickweed (tik'wēd), n. The American pennyroyal, Hedeoma pulegioides.

ticky (tik'i), n. Same as tacky[2].

Ticorea (tī-kō'rē-ạ̈), n. [NL. (Aublet, 1775), from the native name in Guiana.] A genus of plants, of the family Rutaceæ and tribe Cuspariæ. It is characterized by flowers with a short calyx and epipetalous stamens, some of which are sterile, while the others have appendaged anther-cells. There are 3 species, Ticorea longiflora, T. pedicellata, and T. fœtida, natives of Guiana. They are trees or shrubs varying greatly in habit; their leaves or leaflets are pellucid-dotted and entire. The white, scarlet, or yellowish flowers form leafless panicles or cymes, which usually terminate the branchlets.

ticpolonga (tik-pō-long'gạ̈), n. [E. Ind.] A very venomous serpent of India and Ceylon: same as cobra-monil.

Ticuna poison (ti-kö'nạ̈ poi'zn). An arrow-poison used by the Ticunas and other Indian tribes dwelling near the Amazon. When given to animals it produces strong convulsions, lasting for hours. It probably contains picrotoxin, like other South American arrow-poisons. Watts's Dict. of Chem.

tid[1] (tid), n. [An obs. or dial. form (with shortened vowel) of tide[1].] Fit or favorable season or condition: as, the land is in fine tid for sowing; hence, humor. [Scotch.]

Summer fallow has enjoyed a most favourable tid for working, and has pulverized down into fine mould.
The Scotsman.

tid[2] (tid), n. [A dial. var. of tit[1].] 1. An udder; a teat. [Prov. Eng.]—2. A small cock of hay. [Prov. Eng.]

tid[3] (tid), a. [Origin obscure; cf. tidder, v.] Silly; childish. [Prov. Eng.]

tid[4] (tid), a. [Appar. a sham word, assumed to exist in tidbit, and derived from the same source as that here given to tidder; but tidbit is a corruption of titbit.] Tender; soft; nice. See the etymology. Imp. Dict.

tid[5]†, adv. Same as tite[1]. Halliwell.

tidal (tī'dal), a. [< tide[1] + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to a tide or the tides; subject to or characterized by a periodical rise and fall or ebb and flow: as, a tidal river; tidal waters; a tidal basin.

We know that the temperature of comets is increased, chiefly, it has been supposed, by tidal action, as they approach the sun. Nineteenth Century, XXVI. 794.

2. Dependent on the tides: as, a tidal steamer (that is, a steamer the hour of whose departure is regulated by the state of the tide); tidal trains (that is, trains that run in connection with tidal steamers).

Ascertaining first at what time during every evening of this month the tidal trains from Dover and Folkestone reach the London Bridge terminus.
W. Collins, Armadale, v. 3.

Tidal air, the air which passes in and out in breathing, generally estimated at about 25 cubic inches at each respiration. See residual air, under air[1].

Asphyxia takes place whenever the proportion of carbonic acid in tidal air reaches ten per cent. (the oxygen being diminished in like proportion).
Huxley and Youmans, Physiol., § 127.

Tidal alarm, a device for sounding an audible alarm, operated by the ebb and flow of tidal currents. It is generally attached to a buoy or vessel or to a post, to warn vessels off a dangerous locality, as a shoal. E. H. Knight. — Tidal basin, a dock which is filled at high tide. E. H. Knight. — Tidal crack, in arctic regions, a crack or series of cracks in ice along the shore, caused by tidal motion.

Also tide-crack.—Tidal friction, frictional resistance caused by the movement of tidal waters, tending to diminish the angular velocity of the earth's rotation, and hence to lengthen the day.—Tidal harbor, a harbor in which the tide ebbs and flows, in distinction from a harbor which is kept at high water by means of docks with flood-gates. Also tide-harbor.—Tidal motor, a mechanical device by which the ebb and flow of the tide are utilized as a source of power.—Tidal river, a river whose waters rise and fall up to a certain point in its course under the influence of the tide-wave.—Tidal wave. (a) The wave of the tide; a great wave of translation in the ocean moving in the manner in which the wave of the tide moves according to the canal theory, but commonly produced by an earthquake. (b) Figuratively, a wide-spread or general manifestation of strong feeling or sentiment: as, a tidal wave of popular indignation.

tidally (tī′dal-i), adv. As a tide; in a manner dependent on or affected by the tide. Winchell, World-Life, ii. 2.

tidbit (tid′bit), n. Same as titbit.

tiddet. Preterit and past participle of tide[1].

tidder (tid′er), v. t. [Also tiddle; appar. < tidder, a.*, ult. < AS. tēdre = OFries. teddre = D. teeder = MLG. teder, tender, weak. Cf. tid[4].] To use with tenderness; fondle. Johnson.

tiddle (tid′l), v. t.; pret. and pp. tiddled, ppr. tiddling. [A var. of tidder.] I. trans. Same as tidder.

II. intrans. To trifle; potter.

To leave the family pictures from his sons to you, because you could tiddle about them!
Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, I. xlii.

★tiddlywink (tid′li-wingk), n. 1. A shop where money is lent on goods without a pawnbroker's license. Leland. [Slang.]—2. A shop where beer is sold without a license. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

tiddy[1] (tid′i), n. [Origin obscure.] The four of trumps at the game of gleek.

tiddy[2] (tid′i), n.; pl. tiddies (-iz). [Cf. tidy[2].] The European wren. Also tidley-wren. [Prov. ★Eng.]

tide[1] (tīd), n. [Also dial., with shortened vowel, tid; < ME. tide, tyde, tid, tyd, < AS. tīd, time, hour, season, opportunity, = OS. tīd = OFries. tīd = MD. tijd, time, tide of the sea, ghetijde, time, opportunity, tijde, tije, tide of the sea, D. tijd, time, getij, time, opportunity, tij, tide of the sea, = MLG. tīde, getide, time, tide of the sea, LG. tied, time, tide, tide of the sea, = OHG. zīt, zīdh, MHG. zīt, G. zeit, time, = Icel. tīdh, time, tide, hour, service, = Sw. Dan. tid, time, season (not recorded in Goth.); with formative -d (related to AS. tīma, E. time[1] = Icel. tīmi, time, with formative -ma (see time[1]), and to G. ziel, etc., end, goal, with formative -l: see till[1], till[2]), from √ ti, not found outside of Teut. Hence tide[1], v., tiding, etc., betide.] 1. Time; season. [Obsolete except in composition.]

If thi wijf come with a playnt
On man or child at ony tide,
Be not to hasti to fiȝte & chide.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 51.

He keeps his tides well. Shak., T. of A., i. 2. 57.

This wishing a good Tide had its effect upon us, and he was commended for his salutation.
Steele, Tatler, No. 178.

2. Fit time or season; opportunity.

He that tas not his tyme when the tyde askes,
But lettes it deuly ouerdryve with delling to noght,
Wite not his wirdis, thof hym woo happyn!
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 7067.

I have important business,
The tide whereof is now.
Shak., T. and C., v. 1. 90.

Tide Tarrieth for no Man, a pleasant and merry comedy.
George Wapul (1611), title.

[Compare the common proverb "Time and tide wait for no man."]

3. Eccles., a season of the church year; in a narrower sense, a feast-day; a festival: as, Whitsun*tide* (the whole octave or the day only); Hallow*tide*.

What hath it done,
That it in golden letters should be set
Among the high tides in the calendar?
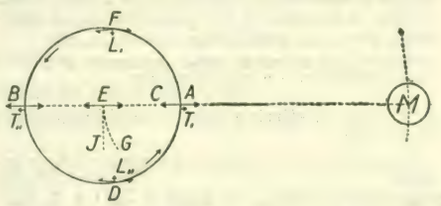
Shak., K. John, iii. 1. 86.

Tide was scrupulously used by the Puritans in composition instead of the Popish word mass, of which they had a nervous abhorrence. Thus, for Christmas, Hallowmas, Lammas, they said Christ-tide, Hallow-tide, Lamb-tide. Luckily Whitsun*tide* was rightly named to their hands. Nares.

4†. Mass; office; service.



They dwell in the lande of Armeneten nere vnto Anthiochyen, and there is whrythyn seruyce of the masses, and theyr other tydes is all in theyr one comon speche so that they all mey vnderstande it what they synge or rede.
R. Eden (First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. xxxi.).

5. A definite period of time; specifically, a day or an hour; in mining, the period of twelve hours.

He ne sholde suffren in no wyse
Custance within his regne for tabyde
Thre dayes and a quarter of a tyde.
Chaucer, Man of Law's Tale, l. 700.

Why weep ye by the tide, lady?
Why weep ye by the tide?
How blythe and happy might he be Gets you to be his bride!
John o' Hazelgreen (Child's Ballads, IV. 84).

6. The periodical rise and fall of the waters of the ocean and its arms, every 12h. and 26m., due to the attraction of the moon and sun. The tides are not perceptible in the open ocean, but their regular wave-like arrival on the shore, where they are increased in range just as surf on a beach is increased in height over the swell that comes in from open water, shows that the whole ocean must be slightly swaying in the tidal period. The period averaging half a lunar day points to the moon as the chief cause of the tides: this was known in the time of Julius Cæsar, but it was first explained by Newton. The simplest statement of the gravitational theory of the tides is as follows: Let C be the center of gravity of the earth and moon. Both bodies revolve around this center about once a month (27¼ days), the plane of the page being the plane of their revolution, and AFBD being the earth's equator. Imagine that the earth is not rotating on its axis. The attraction exerted by the moon on a part of the earth at E equals the inertia-resistance ("centrifugal force") that this part offers to turning from a straight line, EJ, into the curved path of its monthly orbit, EG. At A the lunar attraction is a little greater, and at B a little less than at E; but the inertia-resistances to curved motion are everywhere the same as at E (because—the earth's rotation being omitted—the movement of the earth in its monthly orbit must be conceived without angular turning, so that at any moment all parts are moving in the same direction and with the same velocity, and hence all have the same "centrifugal force"). Hence, at A and B there must be small unbalanced forces, T, and $T_{,,}$ directed outward from the earth's center. At F and D (as far from M as E is) lunar attraction and "centrifugal force" are equal, but they are not exactly opposed, and their resultants, L, and $L_{,,}$ are small forces acting toward or about toward the earth's center. If the diurnal rotation of the earth now be considered, it appears that any point on the equator must experience the forces T, $T_{,}$, $T_{,,}$ $L_{,}$, $L_{,,}$ every 24h. 51m.; and it is in response to forces of this origin that the ocean is caused to sway slightly, rising and falling twice in a lunar day. The same result is reached if all the forces, of which T, $L_{,}$ $T_{,,}$ $L_{,,}$ are four examples, are resolved into their components, tangent to the earth's equator. The maximum values of these components will be found at the four points halfway between A, F, B, and D, two of them being directed toward A and two toward B. The value of the tide-making forces may be roughly calculated in terms of gravity, as follows: As the moon's mass is about $\frac{1}{75}$ of the earth's mass, and as the distance of the moon from the earth's center is sixty times the earth's radius, it follows that lunar attraction at E is $\frac{1}{75} \times \frac{1}{(60)^2}$ or $\frac{1}{355,000}$ of gravity. Lunar attraction at A and at B is $(\frac{60}{59})^2$ and $(\frac{60}{61})^2$ of lunar attraction at E. "Centrifugal force" at A and B being the same as lunar attraction at E, T, equals lunar attraction at A less lunar attraction at E; and $T_{,,}$ equals lunar attraction at E less lunar attraction at B. Thus T, and $T_{,,}$ are found to be almost alike and to equal 0.000,000,01 of gravity. A rough solution for L, and $L_{,,}$ by similar triangles shows them to be $\frac{1}{60}$ of lunar attraction at E, or about $\frac{1}{2}$ of T, or $T_{,,}$. The sun also causes tides, but in spite of the great size of the sun, its distance is so much greater than that of the moon that the solar tides have only about one third of the strength of lunar tides. Hence, lunar tides are not overcome, but only modified by solar tides. At time of new and full moon, lunar and solar tides occur together, and the tidal range is increased, low tide being lower as well as high tide being higher than usual: this is called spring tide. At the quadratures, the lunar and solar tides are opposed, and the range is decreased: this is called neap tides. The tide-making forces vary with the changing distances of moon and sun (the orbits of moon and earth being ellipses), and with the departure of moon and sun from the plane of the earth's equator. The interruption of the oceans by the continents causes innumerable irregularities in the tides. As a result of all these variations and disturbances, the actual tides are extremely complex phenomena. The age of the tide is the interval between the meridian passage of the moon and the arrival of the high tide caused by that passage (spring and neap tides furnish means of identifying corresponding moon-passage and high tide). In certain arms of the sea, the interval is 30 or 40 hours or more. The establishment of the port is the average number of hours between the meridian passage of the moon and the next high tide: it is so called because of its importance in calculating the time of high water for the needs of navigation. High water and low water are the highest and lowest stages of the tide. Flood tide and rising tide are popularly synonymous; but the current of flood tide may continue two or three hours after high water has passed and falling tide has begun (for the tide is actually a wave, and the flood current corresponds to the forward orbital movement of the water as the crest of the wave passes). The same may be said of ebb tide and falling tide. Slack water is the condition of no tidal current (neither flood nor ebb); it need not coincide with high or low water.

The tide of the sea had filled the chanel of the riuer of Ramsa. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 10.

Four and twanty siller bells
Wer a' tyed till his mane,
And yae tift o' the norland wind,
They tinkled ane by ane.
Lord Thomas and Fair Annet (Child's Ballads, II. 128).

2. A draught of liquor: same as tiff[2], 1. Halliwell.

tift[2] (tift), v. i. [Cf. tiff[3], v., and tift[1], n.] Same as tiff[3].

We tifted a little going to church, and fairly quarrelled before the bells had done ringing.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, i. 2.

tift[2] (tift), n. [< tift[2], v. Cf. tiff[3], n.] Same as tiff[3]. [Colloq. or prov. Eng.]

After all your fatigue you seem as ready for a tift with me as if you had newly come from church.
Blackwood's Mag.

tig[1] (tig), v. t.; pret. and pp. tigged, ppr. tigging. [A dial. var. of tick[1].] To touch lightly with the hand, as in the game of tag or tig; give a light stroke or tap to. [Scotch and prov. Eng.]

tig[1] (tig), n. [A dial. var. of tick[1].] 1. A light touch, such as is given in the game of tag or tig; a tap; a slight stroke.

Andrew was compelled to submit, only muttering between his teeth, "Ower mony maisters — ower mony maisters, as the paddock said to the harrow, when every tooth gae her a tig." Scott, Rob Roy, xxvii.

2. Same as tag[2].

On the outskirts of the crowd, some of the town's children . . . profanely playing tigg.
R. L. Stevenson, Education of an Engineer.

[Prov. Eng. or Scotch in both uses.]

tig[2] (tig), n. [Origin obscure.] A flat-bottomed drinking-cup, of capacious size and generally with four handles, formerly used for passing round the table at convivial entertainments. [Prov. Eng. or Scotch.]

Tiga (tī'gą), n. [NL. (Kaup, 1836).] A genus of Asiatic woodpeckers with only three toes on each foot, also called Chrysonotus and Chloropicoides. The inner hind toe, or hallux, is absent (as in Picoides). The genus is wide-ranging on the continent and many of the islands. The type is T. javanensis (formerly Picus tiga and usually T. tridactyla), ranging from Java, etc., to the Malay peninsula and Bengal; T. shorei and T. everetti are the other species. The first-named is a handsome woodpecker, 10 inches long, with golden-greenish back, black tail, crimson occipital crest, pale-buffy sides of the head and neck striped with black, and the under parts rayed and barred with black on a light ground.

Tiga javanensis.

tigarea (tig-a-rē'ą), n. [Guiana.] A plant, the red creeper, Tetracera aspera.

tige (tēzh), n. [< F. tige, a stalk, stem, pipe, < L. tibia, a pipe: see tibia.] 1. A stem or stalk; also, the shaft of a column, from the base-moldings to the capital.—2. In some firearms, a pin at the base of the breech, designed to expand the base of the ball.—3. In a center-fire cartridge, a support for the cap or primer.

tige-arm (tēzh'ärm), n. A muzzle-loading small arm having a steel tige screwed into the center of the breech-pin, upon which the bullet drops and is then forced into the grooves by sharp blows from the ramrod. The powder-charge is placed in the annulus around the tige.

tigella (tī-jel'ą), n. [NL., < F. tigelle, dim. of tige, a stalk, stem: see tige.] Same as tigelle.

tigellate (tij'e-lāt), a. [< NL. tigellatus*, < tigella, a tigella: see tigella.] In bot., having a short stalk, as the plumule of a bean.

tigelle (ti-jel'), n. [< F. tigelle: see tigella.] In bot., the young embryonic axis or primitive stem which bears the cotyledons; the caulicle; the radicle. By some, however, the name has been applied to the plumule.

tigellus (tī-jel'us), n.; pl. tigelli (-ī). [NL., m., equiv. to tigella, f.: see tigella.] In bot., same as tigelle.

tiger (tī'gėr), n. [Formerly also tyger, tigre, tygre; < ME. tigre, tygre, < OF. tigre, tygre, F. tigre = Sp. It. tigre, m., tigra, f., = Pg. tigre, m., = D. tijger = G. the two largest living cats (the other being the lion), of the family Felidæ. The tiger is beautifully striped with black and tawny yellow; it has no mane. The female, when distinguished, is called tigress. The tiger inhabits southern Asia and some of the larger islands belonging to that continent, having there the same position that the lion has in Africa. Thence it ranges north into Siberia, Manchuria, and Korea, though absent from the plateau region of central Asia. In habits the tiger is far more active and agile than the lion, and exhibits a large amount of fierce cunning. He generally selects as his lair a concealed spot near a watercourse, whence to spring upon the animals that approach to drink. His tread through the thick jungle is stealthy, and he appears to avoid rather than court danger, unless when brought to bay, when he turns an appalling front to the foe. Tigers do not generally attack man, but in some cases they seem to acquire a special liking for human prey, and boldly approach villages for the purpose of securing it; such are known as man-eaters (see man-eater, 2). In some districts the loss of human life is enough to become a matter of official statistics. The natives destroy them by traps, pits, poisoned arrows, and other means. Tiger-hunting is a favorite Indian sport. It is pursued generally by Europeans, the tiger being shot from the back of an elephant. Several subspecies should probably be recognized. When taken young the tiger can be tamed, and tigers thus domesticated are occasionally to be seen in India.

2. The thylacine dasyure, or tiger-wolf: so called from the stripes. See thylacine (with cut).—3. A person of a fierce, bloodthirsty disposition.—4. A dissolute swaggering dandy; a ruffling blade; a swaggerer; a hector; a bully; a mohawk.

"A man may have a very good coat-of-arms, and be a tiger, my boy," the Major said, chipping his egg: "that man is a tiger, mark my word—a low man."
Thackeray, Pendennis, xx.

5. [Humorously compared to a tiger in a show-wagon driven about the streets in parade.] A groom who goes out with the equipage of his master—that is, with the dog-cart, curricle, cab, or other vehicle driven by the master himself, his duty being to take care of the equipage when the master has left the box.

His tiger, Tim, was clean of limb,
His boots were polished, his jacket was trim.
With a very smart tie in his smart cravat,
And a little cockade on the top of his hat,
Tallest of boys or shortest of men,
He stood in his stockings just four feet ten.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 283.

6. [Appar. so called as being "an ornamental addition": in allusion to the tiger or groom (def. 5) who sits as if a mere ornament in the vehicle which his master drives.] An additional cheer; "one more" (often the word tiger): as, three cheers and a tiger. [Colloq.]—7. In sugar-manuf., a tank with a perforated bottom, through which the molasses escapes. E. H. Knight.—8. A bug of the family Tingitidæ: translating the French name.—9†. A fabulous bird. See the extract.

Yet ben there other byrdes the whyche ben called Tygris, and they be so stronge that they wyll bere or cary in theyr neste a man sytting vpon an horse all armyd fro the hede to ye fote.

American tiger, the jaguar, Felis onca. See cut under jaguar.—Bengal tiger. See def. 1.—Black tiger, a melanistic variety of the jaguar.—Clouded tiger, the clouded tiger-cat. See tiger-cat.—Heraldic tiger, in her., an imaginary beast unlike a real tiger and more of the shape of a wolf except for having a tufted tail like a lion's. It should always be blazoned heraldic tiger to distinguish it from the real creature, which is sometimes depicted in recent heraldry.—Marbled tiger, the marbled tiger-cat. See marbled.—Mexican tiger, the jaguar.—Red tiger, the cougar. See cut under cougar.—Royal Bengal tiger, the common tiger, Felis tigris. See def. 1.—Saber-toothed tiger, a machærodont; one of the great fossil cats, with enormous upper canines, belonging to the subfamily Machærodontinæ. See Machærodontinæ, and cut under saber-toothed.—Tiger natural, in her., a bearing resembling the real tiger more or less closely: so called to distinguish it from the heraldic tiger.—Tiger swallowtail. See swallowtail.—To buck or fight the tiger. See fight.—Tortoise-shell tiger, the clouded tiger-cat. See cut under tiger-cat.—Water-tiger, a predaceous water-beetle of the family Dytiscidæ: so called from their habits. See Hydradephaga, and cut under Dytiscidæ.

tigerantic† (tī-gē-ran′tik), a. [< tiger + -antic, a capricious addition, prob. in simulation of elephantic.] Ravenous. [Rare.]

In what sheep's-head ordinary have you chew'd away the meridian of your tigerantic stomach?
Tom Brown, Works, II. 179. [(Davies.)

Virginia Tiger-beetle (Tetracha virginica).

tiger-beetle (tī′gėr-bē″tl), n. Any beetle of the family Cicindelidæ: so called from its active predaceous habits. See also cuts under Amblychila and Cicindela.

tiger-bittern (tī′gėr-bit″ėrn), n. A South American bird of the heron family and genus Tigrisoma, of which there are several species: so called from the markings of the plumage. ★See cut under Tigrisoma.

tiger-cat (tī′gėr-kat), n. 1. One of several streaked or spotted cats of the family Felidæ and genus Felis: so called from their resemblance to the tiger in markings or in ferocity, though they are all much smaller, and range down to the size of a large house-cat. These cats are numerous in both hemispheres, and the name has no specific meaning without a qualifying term. The clouded tiger-cat, F. macroscelis, of the East Indies is perhaps the largest and handsomest. The American ocelot is a tiger-cat, and others have their distinctive names, as chati, serval, and margay. See these words, and cuts under serval and ocelot.

Clouded Tiger-cat (Felis macroscelis).

2. A mongrel or hybrid between the wildcat of Europe (F. catus) and the domestic cat.—Long-tailed tiger-cat, Felis macrurus of Brazil, closely resembling the ocelot, and sometimes called ocelot leopard.—Marbled tiger-cat. See marbled.

tiger-cowry (tī′gėr-kou″ri), n. A tiger-shell; a kind of cowry with large spots, Cypræa tigris. See cut under Cypræa.

tiger-eye (tī′gėr-ī), n. Same as tiger's-eye.

tiger-flower (tī′gėr-flou″ėr), n. A plant of the genus Tigridia: so named from the variegation of the flower. The ordinary species is T. pavonia, one of the most showy of garden flowers, having a perianth six inches broad, colored a brilliant scarlet with copious crimson spots toward the dark center. The flower is of a triangular form, the three inner divisions of the perianth being much smaller than the three outer. Each flower lasts only a day, but there is a quick succession for six or eight weeks. There are several varieties, including the yellow and the white tigridias. From its native land sometimes called Mexican tiger-flower. Also tiger-iris.

tiger-footed (tī′gėr-fūt″ed), a. Swift as a tiger; hastening to devour. [Rare.]

This tiger-footed rage, when it shall find
The harm of unscann'd swiftness, will too late Tie leaden pounds to's heels. Shak., Cor., iii. 1. 312.

tiger-frog (tī′gėr-frog), n. Same as leopard-frog.

tiger-grass (tī′gėr-gras), n. A dwarf fan-palm, Nannorhops Ritchieana, of western India, extending into Persia: put by the natives to a great variety of uses. It was formerly classed with Chamærops, from which it chiefly differs by its valvate instead of imbricate petals or corolla-segments.

tigerine (tī′gėr-in), a. [< tiger + -ine[1].] See tigrine.

tigerish (tī′gėr-ish), a. [Also tigrish; < tiger + -ish[1].] Of, pertaining to, or resembling a tiger in appearance, nature, or habits. (a) Fierce, bloodthirsty, or cruel.

Let this thought thy tigrish courage pass.
Sir P. Sidney, Astrophel and Stella.

(b) Swaggering; bully-like. Compare tiger, 4.

Nothing could be more vagrant, devil-me-carish, and, to use a slang word, tigrish, than his whole air.
Bulwer, My Novel, vi. 20.

tigerism (tī′gėr-izm), n. [< tiger + -ism.] 1. Tigerish disposition or propensities.—2. Dissolute swaggering habits; especially, an affectation of such habits.

In France, where tigerism used to be the fashion among the painters, I make no doubt Carmine would have let his beard and wig grow, and looked the fiercest of the fierce.
Thackeray, Character Sketches, The Artists.

tigerkin (tī′gėr-kin), n. [< tiger + -kin.] A little tiger or tiger-cat: used humorously of the domestic cat.

It is only from the attic that you can appreciate the picturesque which belongs to our domesticated tigerkin. The goat should be seen on the Alps, and the cat on the ★housetop.
Bulwer, Caxtons, xiv. 2.

tiger-lily (tī′gėr-lil″i), n. A common garden lily, Lilium tigrinum, native in China, bearing nodding flowers with a reflexed perianth of a dull-orange color spotted with black (whence the name). It produces bulblets in the axils of the leaves. Its bulbs are used for food in China and Japan.

tiger-moth (tī′gėr-môth), n. A moth of the family Arctiidæ, as Arctia caia and Parasemia plantaginis, whose larvæ are bear-caterpillars and woolly bears. Isia isabella is the isabella tiger-moth. Deiopæa bella is a common tiger-moth in the United States. See also cuts under bear[2], Euprepia, and Utetheisa.

Isabella Tiger-moth (Isia isabella).
a, larva; b, cocoon and chrysalis; c, moth.

tiger's-claw (tī′gėrz-klâ), n. Same as baagnouk.★

tiger's-eye (tī′gėrz-ī), n. An ornamental stone of a yellow color, with brilliant, chatoyant, or opalescent reflections due to its delicate fibrous structure. It consists essentially of quartz colored by yellow iron oxid—the latter produced by the alteration of fibers of the blue mineral crocidolite, which originally penetrated the quartz; hence often, though improperly, called crocidolite. It has been obtained in large quantities in the Asbestos Mountains in South Africa. Also tiger-eye.

tiger's-foot (tī′gėrz-fût), n. A twining plant, Pharbitis Pes-tigridis, with pedately lobed leaves, diffused through the old world tropics.

tiger-shark (tī′gėr-shärk), n. A large and voracious shark, Galeocerdo maculatus or else Stegostoma tigrinum, both more or less marked with yellow, of the warmer parts of the Atlantic and Pacific; the zebra-shark.

Tiger-shark (Stegostoma tigrinum).

tiger-shell (tī′gėr-shel), n. The tiger-cowry.

tiger's-milk (tī′gėrz-milk), n. The acrid milky juice of the euphorbiaceous tree Excæcaria Agallocha, found from India to Polynesia. The sap is extremely volatile, and affects the eyes, throat, etc., in gathering. It is used to cure ulcers.

tiger-wolf (tī′gėr-wůlf), n. 1. The spotted hyena, Crocuta maculata. See cut under hyena.—2. The thylacine dasyure, Thylacinus cynocephalus. See cut under thylacine.

tiger-wood (tī′gėr-wůd), n. 1. The wood of Piratinera Guianensis, imported from British Guiana, and used by cabinet-makers.—2. Same as itaka-wood.—3. A variety of citron-wood.

tight†, n. A close; an inclosure; a croft. E. Phillips, 1706.★

tight[1] (tīt), a. [< ME. tight, tiht, tigt (also rarely toght, > E. taught, taut), a var. (with initial t for th due to assimilation with the final t, perhaps after the Sw. Dan. forms) of thight*, thiht, > E. dial. thite, prop. spelled thight*, also theat (after Icel. thē′tr?), < AS. thiht* (not found) = MD. dicht, D. digt = MHG. dīhte, G. dicht, dial. deicht, thick, solid, dense, = Icel. thēttr = Sw. tät = Dan. tæt = Goth. theihts* (not recorded), tight, close, compact; appar. with orig. pp. suffix -t (as in light[1], a.); perhaps akin to thick.] 1. Close or closely compacted in texture or structure. (a) So firmly compacted or put together as to be impermeable or impervious to air, gas, rain, water, etc.: as, a water-tight tank; an air-tight vessel. (b) Stanch; strong; firmly built or made.

'Tis known my father hath no less Than three great argosies; besides two galliases,
And twelve tight galleys. Shak., T. of the S., ii. 1. 381.

Some tight vessel that holds out against wind and water.
Bp. Hall, Naomi and Ruth.

Hence—2. Trim; tidy; neat.

How the tight lass knives, combs, and scissors spies,
And looks on thimbles with desiring eyes.
Gay, Shepherd's Week, Saturday, l. 77.

O, 'tis a snug little island!
A right little, tight little island!
Dibdin, The Snug Little Island.

A tight, likely wench she was, too.
H. B. Stowe, Uncle Tom's Cabin, viii.

Addison, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., ii.

Tom has eaten kidney and pigeon pie, and imbibed coffee, till his little skin is as tight as a drum.
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, i. 4.

8. Produced by or requiring great straining or exertion; severe: as, to get through by a tight pull; specifically, in med., noting a cough accompanied with a painful sense of constriction, and without expectoration; racking; hacking. [Colloq.]—9. Scarce; not easily obtained or obtainable, because held firmly or tied up in some way: applied to money; hence, straitened for want of money: as, a tight money-market. [Commercial slang.]

A few curt sentences . . . told how matters stood in the City;—money was tight; . . . but of that financial sensitiveness that shrinks timidly from all enterprise after a period of crash and bankruptcy Culduff could make nothing. Lever, Bramleighs of Bishop's Folly, I. xxi.

I've known the City now for more than ten years, Mr. Crosbie, and I never knew money to be so tight as it is at this moment. Trollope, Last Chronicle of Barset, xlii.

10. Under the influence of strong drink; intoxicated; tipsy; "full." [Slang.]

No, sir, not a bit tipsy; . . . not even what Mr. Cutbill calls tight. Lever, Bramleighs of Bishop's Folly, I. xxiv.

How she cried out half her sight,
When you staggered by next night,
Twice as dirty as a serpent, and a hundred times as tight.
W. Carleton, Johnny Rich.

11. Noting the condition of the cutting edge of a saw as condensed by hammering. Also small.—In a tight box. See box[2].—Tight cooper. See cooper.—Tight rope, a tensely stretched rope on which an acrobat performs dexterous feats at a greater or less height from the ground.

A damned uneven floor, . . . where a gentleman may break his neck, if he does not walk as upright as a posture-master on the tight-rope. Scott, Kenilworth, xxxiii.

tight[1] (tīt), v. t. [< ME. tighten = Sw. täta = Dan. tætte, make tight; from the adj.] To make tight; tighten. [Obsolete or colloq.]

tight[2] (tīt), adv. See tite[1].

tight[3]†. An old preterit of tie[1].

tighten (tī'tn), v. [< ME.tightnen* (= Sw. tätna); as tight[1] + -en[1].] I. trans. To make tight; draw tighter; straiten; make more close in any manner; constrict.

The bowstring encircled my neck. All was ready; they waited the last signal to tighten the fatal cord.
Marryat, Pacha of Many Tales, Story of Old Woman.
[(Latham.)

II. intrans. To become tight; be drawn tighter.

Her fingers tightened round his own,
And a sound like a tender moan
Parted her lips.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 112.

tightener (tīt'nėr), n. [Also tightner; < tighten + -er[1].] 1. One who or that which tightens, or that which is used for tightening; specifically, in anat., a tensor.

This wheel . . . was driven by a four-inch belt, a tightener pulley being so used as to prevent all slip and to maintain the maximum speed.
Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXIX. 201.

2. A hearty meal. [Slang.]

At one house, known as "Rodway's Coffee-house," a man can have a meal for 1*d.*—a mug of hot coffee and two slices of bread and butter, while for two-pence what is elegantly termed a tightener—that is to say, a most plentiful repast—may be obtained.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 70.

tightening-pulley (tīt'ning-pūl″i), n. A pulley which rests against a band to tighten it, and thus increase its frictional adhesion to the working pulleys over which it runs. E. H. Knight.

tighter (tī'tėr), n. [< tight[1] + -er[1].] Same as tightener. [Obsolete or colloq.]

Julius Cæsar and Pompey were boat-wrights and tighters of ships. Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, ii. 30. (Davies.) tightly[1] (tīt'li), adv. [< tight[1] + -ly[2].] In a tight manner; closely; firmly; compactly; neatly; well.

When we have cozened 'em most tightly, thou shalt steal away the innkeeper's daughter.
Fletcher (and another), Fair Maid of the Inn, ii. 2.

The Marquis of Salisbury came down buttoned up tightly in a black frock coat, carrying a light gray overcoat over his arm. T. C. Crawford, English Life, p. 126.

tightly[2]†, adv. See titcly.

tightner (tīt'nėr), n. Same as tightener.

tightness (tīt'nes), n. The character or quality of being tight, in any sense of that word.

tights (tīts), n. pl. Garments clinging closely to the legs, or to the whole form, and intended either to display the form or to facilitate movement, or both, as in the case of dancers, acrobats, or gymnasts, or for warmth.

A fat man in black tights, and cloudy Berlins.
Dickens, Sketches, Tales, iv.

And I shall be in tights, and dance a breakdown.
W. Black, In Silk Attire, xxxvi.

tigress (tī'gres), n. [< F. tigresse; as tiger + -ess.] A female tiger.

tigretier (tē-gre-tiā'), n. [F.] In Abyssinia, a disease resembling the dancing mania.

Tigridia (tī-grid'i-ą), n. [NL. (Jussieu, 1789), so called from the spotted flowers; < L. tigris, a tiger.] A genus of plants, of the family Iridaceæ, type of the tribe Tigridieæ. It is characterized by flowers with free-spreading segments, the three inner ones much smaller, obtuse, and undulate, and two-parted style-branches with awl-shaped lobes. The 8 species are natives of Mexico, Central America, Peru, and Chile. They are bulbous plants with a few narrow or plicate leaves and one or two terminal spathes, prized for their few singular but evanescent flowers. See tiger-flower.

tigrine (tī'grin), a. [< L. tigrinus, < tigris, a tiger; see tiger.] Like a tiger in coloration: noting various striped or spotted animals, often translating the specific technical word tigrinus or tigrina. Also tigerine.

Tigris (tī'gris), n. [NL., < L. tigris, a tiger: see tiger.] 1. A genus of Felidæ, or section of Felis, based on the tiger, as T. regalis.—2. An obsolete constellation where Vulpecula now is, first found in the planisphere of Bartsch, 1624, and recognized for more than a century following.

tigrish (tī'grish), a. Same as tigerish.

Tigrisoma (tī-gri-sō'mą), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1827), < Gr. τίγρις, tiger, + σῶμα, body.] A genus of bitterns, of the family Ardeidæ and subfamily Botaurinæ, having the plumage closely and profusely variegated; the tiger-bitterns.

Tiger-bittern (Tigrisoma cabanisi).

tig-tag (tig'tag), n. [< tig[1] + tag[2].] Same as tag[2].

tike[1] (tīk), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of tick[2].

tike[2] (tīk), n. [Also tyke; < ME. tike, tyke, < Icel. tīk = Sw. tik, a bitch.] A cur-dog; hence, in contempt, a low, snarling fellow.

Hewe downe hertly 3one heythene tykes!
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 3643.

Avaunt, you curs! . . .
Hound or spaniel, brach or lym,
Or bobtail tike or trundle-tail.
Shak., Lear, iii. 6. 73.

Sacrifice this tyke in her sight, . . . which being done, one of your soldiers may dip his foul shirt in his blood.
Peele, Edward I.

Oh, let us not, like snarling tykes,
In wrangling be divided.
Burns, The Dumfries Volunteers.

tike[3] (tīk), n. [< ME. tike; perhaps a particular use of tike[2].] A countryman or clown; a boor; a churl; a fellow.

Now aren thei lowe cheorles,
As wide as the worlde is wonyeth ther none
Bote vnder tribut and taillage as tikes and cheorles.
Piers Plowman (C), xxii. 37.

He accounts them very honest Tikes, and can with all safety trust his Life in their Hands, for now and then Gilding their Palms for the good Services they do him.
Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [II. 220.

tikel†, v. and a. An obsolete spelling of tickle.

tikoor, tikur (tē-kōr'), n. [Hind. tikūr.] An East Indian tree, Garcinia pedunculata, of the family Clusiaceæ, 60 feet in height, bearing a large yellow fleshy fruit, the seeds invested with a succulent aril. The fruit is of a pleasant acid flavor, and is of similar use to limes and lemons.

tikor (tī'kôr), n. [Hind. tīkhur, Beng. tīkhura.] A starch manufactured from the tubers of an East Indian plant, Curcuma angustifolia, forming the chief arrowroot of India. See Curcuma, 2.

tikur, n. See tikoor.

tikus (tī'kus), n. [Native name.] An animal of the genus Gymnura, as G. rafflesi, native of the Moluccas and Sumatra; the bulau.

til[1]†, prep. An old spelling of till[2].

til[2] (til), n. [< Hind. til, < Skt. tila, the seed of sesamum, also the plant itself.] The sesame, or its seed. Also teel.

tilbury (til'bę-ri), n.; pl. tilburies (-riz). [So called after one Tilbury, a London coachmaker, at the beginning of the 19th century.] A gig or two-wheeled carriage without a top or cover. It has a transverse iron frame, surmounted by a cross-spring, from which the body is hung by leather braces.

tild†, v. t. See teld, tilt[1].

tilde (til'de), n. [Sp. tilde (= OF. title, tiltre), an accent, mark, tittle, a more vernacular form of título, a title: see tittle[2], title.] A diacritic mark (~) placed over the letter n in Spanish to indicate that it is sounded as a palatal n, or very nearly like n followed by y, as in señor, pronounced sąnyôr', cañon, pronounced kąnyōn', and hence in English written canyon. This sound is represented in Portuguese by nh, in Italian and French by gn. The mark ~, also written as a straight dash, like the macron, ¯, was originally a small n, ñ representing nn, as in año for anno, from Latin annus. The mark was much used for n or m in medieval manuscripts, and hence in early printed books, being put above the preceding letter to save space: thus, mōumētū for monumentum. The tilde is also used in the Roman notation of Oriental and other languages: thus, ñ for the Sanskrit palatal nasal. It is sometimes used by analogy over l to indicate l followed by y (Spanish and French ll, Portuguese lh, Italian gl).

Tilden Act. See act.

tile[1] (tīl), n. [Formerly also tyle; < ME. tile, ★tyle, tyil, tyyl, tigel, tegele, < AS. tigel, tigele = D. tegchel, tegel = OHG. ziagal, MHG. ziegel, G. ziegel = Sw. tegel = Dan. tegl = F. tuile = Sp. teja = Pg. telha = It. tegghia, tegola, < L. tegula, usually in the pl. tegulæ, tiles, roof-tiles, a tiled roof, < tegere, cover, roof: see thatch.] 1. A thin slab or plate of baked clay, used for covering the roofs of buildings, paving floors, lining furnaces and ovens, constructing drains, etc., and variously compounded and shaped according to the use in view. In ancient times roofing-tiles cut from marble were often used upon important buildings, carved in the form of those in pottery. The best qualities of brick-earth are used for making tiles, and the process is similar to that of brickmaking. Roofing-tiles are chiefly of two sorts, plain tiles and pantiles, the former being flat, the latter curved, both being laid so as to overlap and carry off any rain they receive. See cut under pantile.

And from on high,
Where Masons mount the Ladder, Fragments fly;
Mortar and crumbled Lime in Show'rs descend,
And o'er thy Head destructive Tiles impend.
Gay, Trivia, ii. 270.

2. A similar slab or plate of pottery, glazed and often decorated, used for ornamental pavements, revetments to walls, etc.; also, a like slab of porcelain, glazed and plain or decorated;

Modern Work in Figured Tiles as applied to a Fireplace.

an encaustic tile; also, a slab of stone or marble used with others like it in a pavement or revetment. In the middle ages such tiles of stone were frequently incised with elaborate designs, the incisions being filled with lead or a colored composition, or occasionally incrusted in mosaic.

3. In metal., a small flat piece of dried earth or earthenware used to cover vessels in which metals are fused.—4. A section of pipe of earthenware, glazed or unglazed. The sections are either made so that one end of every piece enters a socket formed on the contiguous end of the next, or they are joined by being merely placed in apposition and the junction covered with narrow curved strips of earthenware made for the purpose and set in cement. Another form, now less used, consists of arch-shaped tiles which are laid so as to rest on flat tiles forming the bottom.

5. Tiles of any kind collectively; tiling; construction of tiles.

Much of their tile wherewith they cover their Churches and houses is made of woodde. Coryat, Crudities, I. 79.

There, busie Kil-men ply their occupations
For brick and tyle: there for their firm foundations
They dig to hell.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., Babylon.

6. A tall stiff hat; a silk hat: humorously compared to a section of pipe (hence also called stovepipe). [Slang.]

A stalwart old Baron, who, acting as henchman
To one of our early Kings, kill'd a big Frenchman;
A feat which his Majesty deigning to smile on Allow'd him thenceforward to stand with his tile on.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 69.

His damaged tile was in permanent crape for the late lamented Poole. T. Winthrop, Love and Skates.

Alhambra tiles, enameled and painted tiles for architectural ornament, of similar character to those abundant in the palace of the Alhambra—that is, forming when assembled geometrical and interlaced patterns, the pattern being large in scale, and requiring many separate pieces to make up one unit of the design.—Compartment tiles. See compartment.—Drain-tiles, tiles forming a pipe, or made in the form of an arch and laid upon flat tiles (called soles), used to form drains, the smaller sewers, etc. See def. 4.—Dutch tile, a tile of enameled earthenware, painted usually in blue, but sometimes in other colors, generally with scriptural subjects, and used for wall-decoration, for lining fireplaces, etc. These tiles were originally made in the Netherlands about the time of the Renaissance, but the type has since been reproduced in other countries.—Encaustic tile, a wall- or flooring-tile, made by pressing a die upon the clay, filling the depression thus formed with vitrifiable color, or with clay of another color, and then burning to fix the color and design. Such tiles are sometimes enameled. The most common so-called encaustic floor-tiles are unglazed and in small pieces in plain colors, the designs being formed by putting tiles of different shapes and colors together. The name is arbitrary, and without exact reference to the process of manufacture, and is also given to glazed porcelain tiles bearing fired designs in vitrifiable colors. See also under encaustic.—Pan-tile. See pantile.—Plain tile, a roofing-tile in the form of a simple parallelogram, usually about 10½ by 6½ inches, and ⅝ inch thick; a crown-tile. Every tile is pierced at one end with two holes, through which are passed the wooden pins which secure it to the lath. E. H. Knight.—Ridge-tile. Same as crown-tile, 2. (See also crest-tile, crown-tile, hip-tile.) tile[1] (tīl), v. t.; pret. and pp. tiled, ppr. tiling. [Formerly also tyle; < ME. tilen, tylen; < tile[1], n.] To cover or roof with tiles.

At last she saw a fair tyl'd house,
And there she swore by the rood
That she would to that fair tyl'd house,
There for to get her some food.
The West-Country Damosel's Complaint (Child's Ballads, [II. 385).

tile[2] (tīl), v. t.; pret. and pp. tiled, ppr. tiling. [A back-formation, < tiler, 4, the same as tiler, 1, 'one who tiles or makes tiles,' but assumed, because the tiler stands at the closed door, to mean 'one who closes the door': see tiler.] 1. In freemasonry, to guard against the entrance of the uninitiated by placing the tiler at the closed door: as, to tile a lodge; to tile a meeting. Hence—2. To bind to keep what is said or done in strict secrecy.

"Upon my word, Madam," I had begun, and was going on to say that I didn't know one word about all these matters which seemed so to interest Mrs. Major Ponto, when the Major, giving me a tread or stamp with his large foot under the table, said, "Come, come, Snob, my boy, we are all tiled, you know." Thackeray, Book of Snobs, xxv.

tile[3] (tīl), n. Same as til-tree.

tile-copper (tīl'kop″ėr), n. In metal., a product of the smelting of ores of copper which are contaminated to a considerable extent by the presence of other metals, especially tin. The mixture of regulus and copper alloy obtained in treatment of the so-called fine metal is run into molds; in these the regulus separates from the copper, which falls to the bottom, and for this reason is called bottoms; it is then detached from the regulus by blows of a hammer, is roasted, refined, and cast into rectangular plates or tiles, and sold under the name of tile-copper.

tile-creasing (tīl'krē″sing), n. In arch., two rows of plain tiles placed horizontally under the coping of a wall, and projecting about 1½ inches over each side to throw off the rain-water. Also called creasing.

tile-drain (tīl'drān), n. In agri., a drain constructed of tiles.

tile-earth (tīl'ėrth), n. A strong clayey earth; stiff, stubborn land. [Prov. Eng.]

tile-field (tīl'fēld), n. Ground on which tiles are made: as, the palace of the Tuileries in Paris was so named from standing on what was once a tile-field.

tile-fish (tīl'fish), n. 1. A fish of the family Latilidæ, specifically Lopholatilus chamæleonticeps.

Tile-fish (Lopholatilus chamæleonticeps).

This is a fine large fish of brilliant coloration, at one time abundant in deep water off the coast of New England. It was discovered in 1879, and was then found to exist in great numbers, but it was almost exterminated in March, 1882. It has an adipose crest on the back of the head, recalling the crest of a chameleon. The average weight is about 10 pounds, but 50 pounds is sometimes attained. The flesh is excellent. The name tile-fish, given by the discoverers, Goode and Bean (1879), is a pun on the generic word Lopholatilus, suggested by the appearance of tile-painting which this handsome fish presents.

2. The family Latilidæ.

tile-kiln (tīl'kil), n. A kiln for baking tiles.

tile-machine (tīl'ma-shēn″), n. A machine used for making hollow drain-pipes or tiles. It consists essentially of a pug-mill for mixing the clay, a screw for forcing the tempered clay through the dod or mold, and a device for cutting the resulting continuous cylinder into lengths.

tile-ore (tīl'ōr), n. An earthy brick-red to black variety of native cuprous oxid, or cuprite.

tile-oven (tīl'uv″n), n. An oven or kiln in which tiles are baked.

tile-pin (tīl'pin), n. A pin, usually of hard wood, passing through a hole in a tile into the lath, etc., to secure it to the roof.

tiler (tī'lėr), n. [Formerly also tyler, < ME. tiler, tyler, tylare;* < tile[1] + -er[1]. In freemasonry tiler is the same word, fancifully used, like mason itself, in imitation of such terms as literally used in the old mechanic gilds. It is commonly written archaically tyler, and erroneously derived < F. tailleur, a cutter or hewer. The E. word from F. tailleur is tailor. Hence, from tiler, the surname Tiler, more commonly spelled Tyler.] 1. A maker of tiles.

And that the Tylers of the towne compelle not straunge tylers to serue at their rule. And that they kepe no parliament; and that euery tyler marke his tyle.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 374.

2. One who lays tiles, or whose occupation is to cover buildings with tiles.

Nature therefore has played the tiler, and given it [the head] a most curious covering; or, to speak more properly, she has thatched it all over, and that thatching is hair.
Dekker, Gull's Hornbook, p. 80.

3. A tile-kiln.—4. In freemasonry, the doorkeeper of a lodge. Also tyler. Compare tile[2].

tile-red (tīl'red), n. and a. A light, somewhat brownish red, the color of burnt tiles. This is the commonest red tint found in insects, and is, in entomology, oftenest defined simply by the word red, corresponding to the Latin ruber.

tileroot (tīl'röt), n. A plant of the iridaceous genus Geissorhiza, both names referring to the overlapping scales of the rootstock, which consist of the bases of dead leaves. The plants of the genus are showy-flowered, resembling Ixia.

tilery (tī'lėr-i), n.; pl. tileries (-iz). [= F. tuilerie, a place where tiles are made; as tile[1] + -ery.] A factory for tiles; a tile-works.

tile-seed (tīl'sēd), n. A tree of the genus Geissois of the family Cunoniaceæ: named from the imbricated seed. There are 6 species, found in Australia, New Caledonia, and the Fiji Islands.

tilestone (tīl'stōn), n. [< ME. tyelstoon, teghelstan; < tile[1] + stone.] 1. A tile; brick. Wyclif.—2. Any stone suitable for making tiles, or which can be used for roofing, but splitting into layers too thick to be properly called slate (see slate[2]); thin-bedded flagstone. The term tilestone was applied by Murchison to the Downton sandstones and Ledbury shales, which are beds of passage between the Silurian and Old Red Sandstone in Wales.

The term tilestone was subsequently abandoned by Murchison; for, although it was in local use in Caermarthenshire and Brecknockshire, yet there is not a stone capable of being formed into a tile from the Downton Sandstones to the Cornstones of Wall Hills; but there are thin muddy marls over the Downton beds, which would have been tilestones had they been sufficiently hardened, and which are doubtless equivalents of the true tilestones.
Woodward, Geol. of Eng. and Wales (2d ed.), p. 104.

tile-tea (tīl'tē), n. Same as brick-tea.

tile-tree (tīl'trē), n. Same as til-tree.

tile-works (tīl'wėrks), n. sing. and pl. A place where tiles are made; a tilery.

tilewright† (tīl'rīt), n. A worker in clay. Solon, Old Eng. Potter, p. 59.

Tilgate stone. [So called from Tilgate Forest in Sussex, England.] In geol., the name given to beds of calcareous sandstone or ironstone occurring near Hastings, England, in the Ashdown sand, a subdivision of the Hastings beds, by which term the lower section of the Wealden series is known to English geologists. The name Tilgate stone was also given by Mantell to certain beds of calcareous sandstone occurring in the Wadhurst clay—also a local subdivision of the Hastings sand, and so named from the village of Wadhurst, near Tunbridge Wells. This Tilgate stone is noted for its reptilian remains, becoming in places a veritable bone-bed. See Wealden.

As pointed out by Mr. Topley, the "Tilgate Stone" of Dr. Mantell occurs at different horizons in different localities.
Woodward, Geol. of Eng. and Wales (2d ed.), p. 360.

Tilia (til'i-ä), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. tilia, the linden-tree. Hence ult. E. teil, tillet[1].] A genus of trees, type of the family Tiliaceæ and tribe Tilieæ. It is characterized by flowers with a wing-like bract adnate to the peduncle, followed by a globose, indehiscent, one- to two-seeded fruit. There are about 12 species, natives of north temperate regions. They are trees, usually with obliquely heart-shaped serrate leaves two-ranked upon the young branches, which form a light, flat spray. The fragrant white or yellowish flowers form axillary or terminal cymes, conspicuously nectar-bearing, much frequented by bees, and causing the production of honey of excellent quality. The peculiar light-green, membranous, reticulated bract remains persistent on the peduncle, and aids in dispersing the fruit, a cluster of hard, woody, one-celled ovoid or globose nuts. The species are known in general as linden or lime-tree, and the American as basswood. (See linden, and compare lind[1] and bast[1]; also figures under serrate and stigma.) They are remarkable for their tough fibrous inner bark, used, especially in Russia, to make shoes, cords, nets, and coarse cloth, and exported, under the name of Russia matting, to be used in packing, tying plants, etc. The soft pale wood is much used for interior finish, cabinet-work, turnery, woodenware, and carving, and especially in the manufacture of pianos and harps. The leaves are given as food to cattle in parts of Europe; the flowers yield a distilled oil called lime-flower oil, used in perfumery; their infusion is a domestic European remedy for indigestion and hysteria. The trunk sometimes reaches great size, especially in central Europe. The linden of Fribourg, planted in 1476 to commemorate the battle of Morat, was in 1830 nearly 14 feet in diameter; another, near Morat, 38 feet in girth, was then estimated to be 864 years old. Many species are planted as shade-trees, especially the three species of western Europe, all sometimes included under T. Europæa. Of these, T. Europæa, a favorite avenue tree in Germany for nearly three centuries, is the linden commonly planted in Berlin, in England, and in the eastern United States. T. cordata, a small-leaved species, is the common linden of northern Europe, and is probably the only one native in England. In cultivation it is usually small; but one at Uckermark in Germany reaches nearly 23 feet in girth. T. platyphyllos, with yellowish-green leaves and four-ribbed fruit—common in southern Europe, and parent of most of the peculiar varieties of cultivation—is the linden of Versailles and the Tuileries gardens. Three or four species are natives of southeastern Europe, of which T. petiolaris is remarkable for its pendulous branches and elongated leafstalks, and T. argentea, the silver lime, for its freedom from the borers which infest the wood of other species. Six species are natives of China, Manchuria, and Japan, and four are American: one, T. Mexicana, occurs in Mexico, and three are found in the eastern United States. Of these, T. Americana, the basswood, extends from New Flowering Branch of Linden (Tilia Americana). a, flower; b, fruit.

Brunswick and the Assiniboine to Georgia and Texas, and often reaches 4 feet in diameter and 60 or sometimes 130 feet in height. Its wood, known as whitewood, or sometimes, from a faint reddish tinge, as red basswood, is much used for soft woodwork, and especially as a source of paper-pulp, and of packing-material for furniture. The other American species, T. pubescens and T. heterophylla, are principally southern, and produce a globose fruit. The latter species, known as bee-tree, white basswood, or wahoo, is much admired for the beauty of its leaves, whitened and silvery underneath. Its young branches are fed to cattle in winter.

Tiliaceæ (til-i-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Jussieu, 1789), fem. pl. of LL. tiliaceus, of linden-wood, pertaining to the linden, < tilia, the linden-tree: see Tilia.] A family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, the linden family, of the order Malvales. It is distinguished from the Malvaceæ and Sterculiaceæ by the two-celled anthers, and usually free stamens with pendulous ovules. There are about 270 species, belonging to 40 genera, classed in 4 tribes, of which Brownlowia, Grewia, Tilia, and Apeiba are the types. Their leaves are usually alternate, undivided, and furnished with twin stipules. They bear axillary or terminal flowers, often in small cymes, which are sometimes disposed in ample corymbs or panicles. The family is numerous in the tropics, where they are often weedy herbs, or are shrubs or trees with handsome, usually white or pink flowers. A few genera are timber-trees of north or south temperate regions. They have a mucilaginous wholesome juice, and yield a remarkably tough fiber, used to make fishing-nets, bags, mats, etc. Some produce edible berries, as Grewia. Some are used for dyeing or tanning; and the fruits of several are employed as astringents. See cuts under jute and Tilia.

tiliaceous (til-i-ā′shius), a. Belonging to the family Tiliaceæ.

Tilieæ (ti-lī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1862), < Tilia + -eæ.] A tribe of plants, of the family Tiliaceæ. It is characterized by flowers with distinct sepals, and colored petals inserted closely around the stamens. It includes fifteen genera, among which the chief are Tilia (the type), Vossianthus, and Corchorus.

tilier†, n. A Middle English form of tiller[1].

tiling (tī′ling), n. [Verbal n. of tile[1], v.] 1. The operation of covering or roofing with tiles. —2. An assemblage of tiles, as on a roof; tiles collectively or in general.

They went upon the housetop, and let him down through the tiling with his couch into the midst before Jesus. Luke v. 19.

Asphalt tiling. See asphalt.

till[3] (til), n. [Early mod. E. tyll; < till[3], v.] 1. A drawer; a tray, as of a trunk or box. Also called tiller.

Closets; and in them many a chest; . . .
In those chests, boxes; in each box, a till.
G. Herbert, The Temple, Confession.

Specifically—2. A money-drawer; a drawer under or in a shop-counter, in which money is kept.

They break up counters, doors, and tills. Swift.

It [the dust] treasured itself up, too, in the half-open till, where there still lingered a base sixpence.
Hawthorne, Seven Gables, ii.

3. In printing: (a) In earlier forms of hand printing-presses, a crosspiece extending between the main uprights of the frame, and serving to guide and steady the hose or sleeve, which contained the spindle and screws. Also called shelf. (b) One of the spaces or cells between the ribbed projections of the platen of a hand-press.

till[4] (til), n. [Origin obscure.] In geol., a stiff clay containing boulders of all sizes up to several tons in weight, and these often smoothed and striated by glacial action. The word first became current among geologists, with this meaning, in Scotland, but it is now occasionally used elsewhere. Also called boulder-clay.

tillable (til′a-bl), a. [< till[1] + -able.] Capable of being tilled; arable; fit for the plow.

The tillable fields are in some places so hilly that the oxen can hardly take sure footing.
R. Carew, Survey of Cornwall, fol. 20.

Tillæa (ti-lē′ä), n. [NL. (Micheli, 1735), named after M. Tilli (died 1740), an Italian botanist.] A genus of plants, of the family Crassulaceæ. It is characterized by flowers with from three to five petals, nearly or quite free, and equaling or surpassing the calyx, as many stamens, and free carpels. There are about 20 species, diminutive cosmopolitan plants, often smooth and slightly fleshy aquatics. They bear opposite entire leaves, and minute axillary white or reddish flowers. See pygmy-weed for the principal American species. T. muscosa occurs on moist heaths and sands from England to northern Africa.

tillage (til′āj), n. [Early mod. E. also tyllage; < till[1] + -age.] The operation, practice, or art of tilling land, or preparing it for seed, and keeping the ground free from weeds which might impede the growth of crops; cultivation; culture; husbandry. Tillage includes manuring, plowing, harrowing, and rolling land, or whatever is done to bring it to a proper state to receive the seed, and the operations of plowing, harrowing, and hoeing the ground to destroy weeds and loosen the soil after it is planted.

First Cain is born, to tillage all adicted;
Then Able, most to keeping flocks affected.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Handy-Crafts.

Statutes of Tillage, in Eng. hist., several statutes for the encouragement of tillage, especially of the reigns of Henry VII., Henry VIII., and Elizabeth.

tillage-rake (til′āj-rāk), n. In her., a bearing representing an ordinary agricultural rake, or the head of one: usually the teeth or points are more curved than in the actual implement.

till-alarm (til′a-lärm′), n. A device for sounding an alarm when a drawer, as a money-drawer or till, is opened.

Tillandsia (ti-land′zi-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1735), named for Prof. Tillands of Åbo, Finland.] 1. A genus of plants, of the family Bromeliaceæ, the pineapple family, type of the tribe Tillandsieæ. It is characterized by flowers with free petals and stamens, and by numerous linear seeds produced at the base into a long stalk appendaged with threads resembling pappus. There are about 250 species, natives of tropical and subtropical America. They are polymorphous plants, usually epiphytic, sometimes growing on rocks, but rarely in the soil. They bear narrow entire leaves, and are often covered with furfuraceous dusty particles. The flowers form a terminal spike, or are rarely solitary. About 13 species occur in the southern United States, all rigid erect epiphytes. Dendropogon usneoides, by some authors referred to Tillandsia, is peculiar in its filiform Long-moss (Dendropogon usneoides).

pendent stems, clothing the branches of trees, and forming a characteristic feature of southern forests, extending far westward, and north to the Dismal Swamp of Virginia. This species bears two-ranked awl-shaped recurved leaves, and small solitary green flowers, and is variously known as Florida moss, hanging-moss, etc. (See black-moss and long-moss.) It is used for decoration in the natural state, and is gathered in large quantities for upholsterers, for whose use it is steeped in water or buried in earth till the outer part is rotted off, leaving a coarse tough fiber used for stuffing mattresses. The leaves of T. utriculata, a native of southern Florida and the West Indies, are dilated at the base into large cavities, often containing a pint of clear water, eagerly sought by wayfarers. Several species are occasionally cultivated as greenhouse epiphytes.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.

The long hairy tillandsia, like an old man's beard, three or four feet long, hung down from the topmost branches.
Lady Brassey, Voyage of Sunbeam, I. viii.

tillar†, n. An obsolete variant of tiller[2].

tiller[1] (til′ėr), n. [< ME. tilier, tylyere (= MLG. teler); < till[1] + -er[1].] One who tills; a husbandman; a cultivator; a plowman.

Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 149.

tillodont (til′ō-dont), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Tillodontia.

II. n. A member of the Tillodontia.

Tillodontia (til-ō-don′shi-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τίλλειν, pluck, tear, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A remarkable group of fossil perissodactyl animals from the Middle and Lower Eocene of North America, represented by generalized or synthetic types which seem to combine some characters of ungulates, rodents, and carnivores. As an order it is represented by the family Tillodontidæ. Also Tillodonta.

Tillodontidæ (til-ō-don′ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tillodontia + -idæ.] A family of extinct mammals, representing the Tillodontia.

Tillotheriidæ (til″ō-thē-rī′i-dē), n. pl. [< Tillotherium + -idæ.] A family of fossil mammals, represented by the genus Tillotherium.

Tillotherium (til-ō-thē′ri-um), n. [NL. (Marsh, 1873), < Gr. τίλλειν, pluck, tear, + θηρίον, a wild beast.] 1. A genus of Eocene American mammals, referred to the Tillodontia: probably the same as Anchippodus. T. fodiens had a skeleton resembling that of carnivores; the skull like that of a bear; molars as in ungulates: rodent-like incisors; the femur with three trochanters: the feet plantigrade, with five clawed digits; and scaphoid and lunar carpals distinct. 2. [l. c.] An animal of this genus.

tillow (til′ō), v. i. A corruption of tiller[3].

tills (tilz), n. pl. [Shortened from lentils, on the ground that Lent "agreeth not with the matter."] The lentil. [Old prov. Eng.]

tillt (tilt). Till (or to) it. See till[2], prep., 1. [Scotch.]

tilly (til′i), a. [< till[4] + -y[1].] Having the character of till or boulder-clay: as, soil resting on a tilly bed.

tilly-fally†, interj. See tilly-vally.

tilly-seed (til′i-sēd), n. [Also tilley-seed; < tilly* (< NL. Tiglium?) + seed.] The seed of an East Indian tree, Croton Tiglium (Croton Pavana of Hamilton). The seeds yield croton-oil.

tilly-vally (til′i-val′i), interj. [Also (Sc.) tillie-vallie, tillie-wallie, and formerly tilly-fally; origin obscure.] An interjection, equivalent to nonsense! bosh!

She [his wife] used to say afterwards Tillie vallie, tillie vallie, what will you do, Mr. More?—will you sit and make goslings in the ashes? Sir T. More's Utopia, Int., p. xv.

Tilly fally, Sir John, ne'er tell me; your ancient swaggerer comes not in my doors. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 4. 90.

tilmus (til′mus), n. [NL., < Gr. τιλμός, a pulling, tearing (of the hair), < τίλλειν, pluck, pull, tear.] In med., floccillation, or picking of bedclothes. See floccillation.

tilt[1] (tilt), v. [< ME. tilten, tylten, tulten, < AS. ★tyltan* (by mutation from tealtian*) = OHG. zelten*, amble (in deriv. zeltāri. MHG. G. zelter, an ambler, a horse that ambles), = Icel. tölta, amble, = Sw. tulta, waddle; from the adj. seen in AS. tealt, unsteady, unstable, tottering. Cf. D. tel-ganger for telt-ganger*, an ambler; MHG. zelt, G. dial. zelt, pace, amble; Icel. tölt*, pace, amble, in hōf-tölt, lit. 'hoof-tilt'; root unknown. Connection with till[3], 'draw' or 'lift,' is improbable.] I. intrans. 1†. To totter; tumble; fall; be overthrown.

Whou he com in-to the lond leeue thou for sothe, Feole temples ther-inne tulten to the eorthe.
Joseph of Arimathie (E. E. T. S.), p. 4.

2. To move unsteadily; toss.

The fleet swift tilting o'er the surges flew.
Pope, Odyssey, iv. 797.

The long green lances of the corn
Are tilting in the winds of morn.
Whittier, The Summons.

3. To heel over; lean forward, back, or to one side; assume a sloping position or direction.

I am not bound to explain how a table tilts any more than to indicate how, under the conjuror's hands, a pudding appears in a hat. Faraday, Mental Education.

4. To charge with the lance; join in a tilting contest, or tilt; make rushing thrusts in or as in combat or the tourney; rush with poised weapon; fight; contend; rush.

Our Glass is heer a bright and g'list'ring shield;
Our Satten, steel; the Musick of the Field
Doth rattle like the Thunders dreadfull roar;
Death tilteth heer.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Vocation.

Swords out, and tilting one at other's breast.
Shak., Othello, ii. 3. 183.

We'l frisk in our shell; . . .
Now Mortals that hear
How we Tilt and Carrier
Will wonder with fear.
Buckingham, Rehearsal, v. 1.

I'm too discreet
To run a-muck, and tilt at all I meet.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. i. 70.

5. To rush; charge; burst into a place. [Colloq.]

The small young lady tilted into the buttery after my grandmother, with the flushed cheeks and triumphant air of a victor. H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, xx.

To tilt at the ring. See ring[1].

II. trans. 1. To incline; cause to heel over; give a slope to; raise one end of: as, to tilt a barrel or cask in order to facilitate the emptying of it; to tilt a table.

A favourite game with Shelley was to put Polly on a table and tilt it up, letting the little girl slide its full length. E. Dowden, Shelley, II. 123.

They spent a good deal of time, also asleep in their accustomed corners, with their chairs tilted back against the wall. Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, Int., p. 15.

2. To raise or hold poised in preparation for attack.

Sons against fathers tilt the fatal lance.
J. Philips, Cider, ii. 603.

3. To attack with a lance or spear in the exercise called the tilt.—4. To hammer or forge with a tilt-hammer or tilt: as, to tilt steel to render it more ductile.—Tilted steel. Same as shear-steel.—To tilt up, in geol., to turn up or cause to incline, and, as this word is more generally used, at a somewhat ★steep angle.

tilt[1] (tilt), n. [< tilt[1], v. Cf. E. dial. tolt, a blow against a beam or the like.] 1. A sloping position; inclination forward, backward, or to one side: as, the tilt of a cask; to give a thing a tilt.

A gentleman of large proportions, . . . wearing his broad-brimmed, steeple-crowned felt hat with the least possible tilt on one side. O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 62.

2. A thrust. [Rare.]

Two or three of his liege subjects, whom he very dexterously put to death with the tilt of his lance.
Addison, Freeholder, No. 10.

3. An exercise consisting in charging with the spear, sharp or blunted, whether against an antagonist or against a mark, such as the quintain. During the middle ages citizens tilted on horseback, and also in boats, which were moved rapidly against one another, so that the defeated tilter was thrown into the water.

There shalbe entertained into the said Achademy one good horsman, to teache noble men and gentlemen . . . to runne at Ringe, Tilte, Towrney, and cowrse of the fielde.
Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S.), p. 4.

See at the Southern Isles the tides at tilt to run.
Drayton, Polyolbion, ii. 219.

The tilt was now opened, and certain masqued knights appeared in the course.
I. D'Israeli, Calam. of Authors, II. 224.

4. pl. The dregs of beer or ale; washings of beer-barrels.

Musty, unsavory or unwholesome tilts, or dregs of beer and ale. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, IV. 99.

5. A tilt-hammer.

The hammering under the heavy tilt condenses the metal, and causes the dross and scale to fly off. W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 221.

6. A mechanical device for fishing through an opening in the ice. A simple tilt is a lath or narrow board with a hole bored through one end, through which a round stick is run, both ends of the board resting on the sides of the hole in the ice. The line is attached to the short end of the lath, and when a fish is hooked his weight tips up the larger end, thus indicating that he is caught. An improved tilt consists of an upright with an arm over which the line passes down into the water. When a fish bites, the line is cast off, and the arm falls and automatically hoists a little flag on the upright as a signal. There are many other modifications of the same device. Also called tilter, tilt-up, and tip-up.

7. A pier, built of brush and stone, on which fishermen unload and dress their fish. [Newfoundland.] — Full tilt, at full speed and with direct thrust; without wavering; direct and with full force: as, to run full tilt against something.

The beast . . . comes full tilt at the Canoa. Dampier, Voyages, an. 1676.

Full tilt against their foes,
Where thickest fell the blows,
And war cries mingling rose,
"St. George!" "St. Denys!"
R. H. Stoddard, Ballad of Crecy.

★tilt[2] (tilt), n. [An altered form of ME. telt, itself altered, prob. by the influence of the Dan. telt = Sw. tält, from teld, < AS. teld, geteld = MD. telde = LG. telt = OHG. MHG. zelt (more commonly gizelt), G. zelt = Icel. tjald = Sw. tält = Dan. telt (with final -t, after G. ?), a tent; hence, from Teut. (Goth. ?), Sp. Pg. toldo, a tent; from the verb shown in AS. teldan* (in comp. beteldan), cover (> OF. taudir, cover, > taudis, a hut). The noun tilt, for teld, may have been influenced in part by association with tilt[1], as if lit. 'a sloping cover.'] A covering of some thin and flexible stuff, as a tent-awning; especially, in modern use, the cloth cover of a wagon.

Being on shore, wee made a tilt with our oares and sayle. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. ii. 34.

These pleasure barges were more or less ornate, and varied from the ordinary boat with a tilt of canvas or green boughs to very elaborately carved and gilded ones. J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II. 148.

tilt[2] (tilt), v. t. [< tilt[2], n.] To furnish with an awning or tilt, as a wagon or a boat.

tilt[3] (tilt), n. [Prob. short for tilt-up, 2.] The North American stilt, Himantopus mexicanus. See cut under stilt. J. E. De Kay, 1842.

tilt-boat (tilt'bōt), n. A boat having a tilt or awning.

Where the Ships, Hoys, Barks, Tiltboats, Barges, and Wherries do usually attend to carry Passengers and Goods. John Taylor (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 223).

tilter (til'tėr), n. [< tilt[1] + -er[1].] 1. One who or that which tilts, inclines, or gives a slope to something; a contrivance for tilting a cask, a cannon, or other object.

The tilter, which takes the place of carrier or lifter in other guns, is constructed of one piece, and is pivoted in line with the magazine tube. Sci. Amer., N. S., LXIII. 230.

2. One who tilts, or joins in a tilting-match.

While he was in England, he was a great Tilter. Coryat, Crudities, I. 46.

A fine hobby-horse, to make your son a tilter? a drum, to make him a soldier? B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, iii. 1.

3. A forger who uses a tilt-hammer.—4. In fishing, same as tilt[1], 6.

tilth (tilth), n. [< ME. tilthe, < AS. tilth, tilling, crop, < tilian, till: see till[1].] 1. The act of tilling; plowing, sowing, and the round of agricultural operations; tillage; cultivation.

One high steeple, where the Arabians after they haue ended their tilth lay vp their instruments of husbandry, none daring to steale his neighbours tooles, in reuerence of a Saint of theirs, there buried. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 615.

Far and wide stretches a landscape rich with tilth and husbandry, boon Nature paying back to men tenfold for all their easy toil. J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 200.

2. The state of being tilled, or prepared for a crop: as, land is in good tilth when it is manured, plowed, broken, and mellowed for receiving the seed.—3. That which is tilled; tillage-ground.

Bote Treuthe schal techen ow his teeme for to dryue, Bothe to sowen and to setten and sauen his tilthe.
Piers Plowman (A), vii. 128.

Strew silently the fruitful seed,
As softly o'er the tilth ye tread.
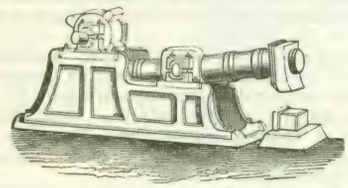
Bryant, Song of the Sower.



4. Crop; produce.

Sent the sonne to saue a cursed mannes tilth.
Piers Plowman (B), xix. 430.

5. The degree or depth of soil turned by the plow or spade in cultivation; that available soil on the earth's surface into which the roots of crops strike.

The tilth, or depth of the ploughing, rarely exceeded six inches, and oftener was less. N. S. Shaler, Kentucky, p. 55.

tilt-hammer (tilt'ham″ėr), n. In mech., a power machine-tool for hammering, forging, etc. It is a development from the trip-hammer, and, though for large work it has been superseded by the steam-hammer, and for light work by drop-presses and drop-hammers, it is still used in shovel-making and other light forging. It consists essentially of a lever of the first or third order, and is operated by a cam-wheel or eccentric, the hammer being placed at the end of the longer arm of the lever. One type, known as the cushioned hammer, is fitted with rubber cushions to prevent jarring and noise. See trip-hammer.

tilting-fillet (til'ting-fil″et), n. See fillet.

tilting-gauntlet (til'ting-gänt″let), n. A variety of gauntlet which could be secured firmly with a hook, so that the hand could not be opened nor the lance struck from its grasp. Compare main-de-fer.

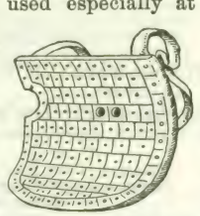
tilting-helmet (til'ting-hel″met), n. A heavy helmet used for the just from the time when this sport was no longer pursued in the arms of war. In the fifteenth century these helmets were so large that the head could move freely within them, their whole weight coming upon the gorgerin. The lumière, or slit for vision, was in such a position that when the knight had couched his lance and stooped forward for the course he could see the helmet of his adversary, but when seated in the saddle he could not see before him, but only upward; the air-opening of this helmet was on the right side, as the blow of the lance came on the left. In the sixteenth century the helmets were still heavier.



Tilting-helmet, 16th century.

tilting-lance (til'ting-lăns), n. A lance used in the just or tilt which often differed from the war-lance, especially in the head (see coronal, n., 2). It was also furnished more generally than the war-lance with the roundel, and with the bur to secure the grasp of the hand, and was frequently decorated with painting and gilding. Some tilting-lances have been preserved which from their extreme lightness are evidently hollow, and representations in manuscripts show some of so great a diameter that they must have been built up as with staves; but these perhaps were used only for the quintain and similar sports. Compare rest[1], n., 6 (a), couch[1], v. t., 8, charge, 19. See cuts under morne and quintain.

tilting-shield (til'ting-shēld), n. See shield.

tilting-spear (til'ting-spēr), n. 1. Same as tilting-lance.—2. In her., the representation of a tilting-lance used as a bearing, the shaft being much shortened, and the coronal, bur, vamplate, etc., exaggerated in size.

tilting-target (til'ting-tär″get), n. The shield of the fifteenth century, used especially at justs, rounded convexly from side to side and concavely from top to bottom, so that the thrust of the lance would glance off sidewise. These targets were often of great breadth proportionally and curved into nearly a semicircle; they were sometimes covered with thin plates of horn, secured to wood, the surface of that material being especially calculated to cause the coronal to glance.

Tilting-target, beginning of 15th century. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dict. du Mobilier français.") tilt-mill (tilt'mil), n. 1. The machinery by which tilt-hammers are worked.—2. The building in which a tilt-hammer is operated.

tilt-tree (til'trē), n. [< L. tilia: see teil.] The linden, chiefly Tilia Europæa.—Canary Island tilt-tree, Ocotea (Oreodaphne) fœtens, noted for its ill-smelling wood. Also tile, tile-tree.

tilt-up (tilt'up), n. 1. In fishing, same as tilt[1], 6.—2. In ornith., a fiddler or teetertail. See cut under Tringoides.

tilture† (til'tūr), n. [Irreg. < till[1] + -ture, apparently in imitation of culture.] Husbandry; cultivation; tilth.

Good tilth brings seeds,
Ill tilture weeds.
Tusser, Husbandry, March's Abstract.

tilt-yard (tilt'yärd), n. A place for tilting, differing from the lists in being permanent. The outer court of a castle was often used as the tilt-yard.

When Solyman ouerthrew King Lewis of Hungarie, he carried away three Images of cunning worke in Brasse, representing Hercules with his Club, Apollo with his Harpe, Diana with her Bow and Quiuer, and placed them in the tiltyard at Constantinople. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 294.

Squiring to tilt-yards, play-houses, pageants, and all such public places. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, Palinode.

Wood suitable for building houses or ships, or for use in carpentry, joinery, etc.; trees cut down and squared or capable of being squared and cut into beams, rafters, planks, boards, etc.

Of this pyece off tymbre made the Iewes the crosse of oure lord. Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 155.

Ye've taken the timber out of my ain wood,
And burnt my ain dear jewel!
Lady Marjorie (Child's Ballads, II. 341).

2. Growing trees, yielding wood suitable for constructive uses; trees generally; woods. See timber-tree.

The old ash, the oak, and other timber shewed no signs of winter. Gray, Letters, I. 247.

3. In British law, the kind of tree which a tenant for life may not cut; in general, oak, ash, and elm of the age of twenty years and upward, unless so old as not to have a reasonable quantity of useful wood in them, the limit being, according to some authorities, enough to make a good post. Local customs include also (a) some other trees, such as beech or hornbeam, and (b) trees of less or greater age or tested by girth instead of age.

4. Stuff; material.

They are the fittest timber to make great politics of. Bacon, Goodness (ed. 1887).

5. A single piece of wood, either suitable for use in some construction or already in such use; a beam, either by itself or forming a member of any structure: as, the timbers of a house or of a bridge.—6. Naut., one of the curving pieces of wood branching upward from the keel of a vessel, forming the ribs.—7. The wooden part of something, as the beam or handle of a spear

He bowed on his horse nekke, and the tymbir of the speres fly in peces. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 541.

8. The stocks. [Rare.]

The squire . . . gives me over to the beadle, who claps me here in the timber. D. Jerrold, Men of Character, Christopher Snub, i.

Compass timber, timber, especially oak, bent or curved in its growth to the extent of more than five inches in a length of twelve feet. It is valuable in ship-building and for other uses.—Rising timbers. See rising.—Shiver my timbers. See shiver[1].—Side timber. Same as purlin.—Timber claim. See claim[1].—Timber-culture acts, acts of the United States Congress for the encouragement of the growth of forest-trees upon the public lands, by providing that an eighty-acre homestead may be given to any settler who has cultivated for two years five acres planted with trees (or 160 acres for 10 acres of trees). The patent was granted at the end of three years, instead of five as under the homestead acts. By act of Congress, 1891, these laws were repealed in regard to future entries, but continued, with certain modifications, for the adjustment of existing claims.—To spot timber. See spot.

II. a. Constructed of timber; made of wood.

What wonderful wind-instruments are these old timber mansions, and how haunted with the strangest noises . . . whenever the gale catches the house with a window open, and gets fairly into it! Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xviii.

Timber mare, a bar or rail sometimes fitted with legs to form a sort of wooden horse: used as an instrument of punishment, the offender being compelled to ride it astride. This is a mild modern modification of an ancient instrument of torture of similar name. See Equuleus, 2.

A wooden machine which soldiers ride by way of punishment. It is sometimes called a timber-mare.
★ Johnson, Dict. (under horse).

timber[1] (tim′bėr), v. [< ME. timbren, tymbren, < AS. timbrian = OS. timbrian, timbron = OFries. timbra, timmera = D. timmeren = MLG. timberen, timmeren = OHG. zimbrōn, MHG. zimbern, G. zimmern = Icel. timbra = Sw. timra = Dan. tömre = Goth. timrjan, build; from the noun.]

Would have reverted to my bow again.
Shak., Hamlet, iv. 7. 22.

That piece of cedar,
That fine well timbered gallant.
B. Jonson, Volpone, iv. 2.

2. Made of or furnished with timber or timbers: as, a well-timbered house; well-timbered land.

About a hundred yards from the Fort on the Bay by the Sea there is a low timbered House, where the Governour abides all the day time. Dampier, Voyages, II. i. 172.

3†. Made like timber; massive, as heavy timber.

His timbered bones all broken rudely rumbled.
Spenser, F. Q., V. ii. 50.

From toppe to toe yee mighte her see,
Timber'd and tall as cedar tree.
Puttenham, Partheniades, vii.

timbered[2], timbred (tim′bėrd), a. [< timber[3] + -ed[2].] In her., ensigned by a helmet or other head-piece set upon it: said of the escutcheon.

timberer (tim′bėr-ėr), n. Same as timberman.

timber-frame (tim′bėr-frām), n. Same as gang-saw. E. H. Knight.

timber-grouse (tim′bėr-grous), n. Any grouse of wood-loving habits, as the ruffed grouse, the pine-grouse, or the spruce-partridge. [U. S.]

timber-head (tim′bėr-hed), n. Naut., the top end of a timber, rising above the deck, and serving for belaying ropes, etc.: otherwise called kevel-head.

timber-hitch (tim′bėr-hich), n. Naut., the end of a rope taken round a spar, led under and over the standing part, and passed two or three turns round its own part, making a jamming eye. See hitch.

timbering (tim′bėr-ing), n. Timber-work; timbers collectively: as, the timbering of a mine.

timber-line (tim′bėr-līn), n. The elevation above the sea-level at which timber ceases to grow. It differs in different climates.

timberling (tim′bėr-ling), n. [< timber[1] + -ling[1].] A small timber-tree. [Local.]

timber-lode (tim′bėr-lōd), n. In law, formerly, a service by which tenants were to carry timber felled from the woods to the lord's house.

timberman (tim′bėr-man), n.; pl. timbermen (-men). 1. In mining, one who attends to preparing and setting the timbering used for supporting the levels and shafts in a mine, or for any other purpose connected with the underground work.

The timberman who sets up the props has usually no special tool except his axe, which weighs from 4½ to 5½ pounds; on one side of the head there is a cutting edge which is not quite parallel to the handle, and on the other side a poll which is used for driving up props.
Callon, Lectures on Mining (tr. by Le Neve Foster and [Galloway), I. 231.

2. In entom., a European longicorn beetle, Acanthocinus or Astynomus ædilis.

timber-merchant (tim′bėr-mėr″chant), n. A dealer in timber.

timber-scribe (tim′bėr-skrīb), n. A metal tool or pointed instrument for marking timber; a race-knife.

timber-sow† (tim′bėr-sou), n. A sow-bug or wood-louse. See Oniscus. Bacon.

timber-tree (tim′bėr-trē), n. A tree suitable for timber. Many timber-trees of great value are afforded by the Coniferæ, as various kinds of pine, spruce, fir, cypress, cedar, the redwood, etc. Still more numerous, and distributed through many families, are the dicotyledonous timber-trees, including numerous oaks, eucalypts, ashes, elms, teak, mahogany, greenheart, chestnut, walnut, tulip, etc. Among monocotyledons, the palms afford some timber, but almost no other family, unless the bamboo-wood can be so called.

timber-wolf (tim′bėr-wůlf), n. The ordinary large gray or brindled wolf of western parts of North America, Canis lupus occidentalis. Though by no means confined to wooded regions, this wolf is so named in antithesis to prairie-wolf (the coyote), now Canis griseus. [Western U. S.]

timber-work (tim′bėr-wėrk), n. Work formed of timbers.

timber-worm (tim′bėr-wėrm), n. 1†. A wood-worm or timber-sow; a sow-bug.

What, o what is it
That makes yee, like vile timber-wormes, to weare
The poasts sustaining you?
Davies, Sir T. Overbury, p. 16. (Davies.)

2. The larva of any insect injurious to timber. See timber-beetle.

timber-yard (tim′bėr-yärd), n. A yard or place where timber is deposited or sold; a wood- or lumber-yard.

timbestere†, n. See tumbester.

timbourine† (tim-bǒ-rēn′), n. [Also timburine; cf. tambourine, timbre[2].] A tambourine. B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, i. 2.

timbre[1]†. An old spelling of timber[1], timber[2], timber[3].

timbre[2]†, n. [< ME. timbre, < OF. timbre, tymbre, a drum, < L. tympanum, a drum: see tympan, tympanum. Cf. timbrel and timbre[3].] A tambourine; a timbrel.

timbre[2]†, v. i. To play the timbrel.

Blowinge off bugles and bemes aloft,
Trymlinge of tabers and tymbring soft.
Roland, MS. Lansd. 388, f. 381. (Halliwell.)

timbre[3] (tim′bėr or taṅ′br), n. [< F. timbre, timbre, a drum: see timbre[2].] In acoustics, that characteristic quality of sounds produced from some particular source, as from an instrument or a voice, by which they are distinguished from sounds from other sources, as from other instruments or other voices; quality; tone-color. As an essential characteristic of all sounds, timbre is coördinate with pitch and force. It is physically dependent on the form of the vibrations by which the sound is produced—a simple vibration producing a simple and comparatively characterless sound, and a complex vibration producing a sound of decided individuality. Complex vibrations are due to the conjunction at once of two or more simple vibrations, so that complex tones are really composed of two or more partial tones or harmonics. Not only do instruments and voices have a peculiar timbre by which they may be recognized, but their timbre may be varied considerably by varying the method of sound-production.

timbred (tim′bėrd), a. See timbered.

timbrel (tim′brel), n. [A dim. of ME. timbre ★(see timbre[2]), prob. suggested by Sp. tamboril (= It. tamburello), dim. of tambor, etc., a tambor: see tambor. Cf. timbourine, timburine, for tambourine.] Same as tambourine. See also tabor[1].

And Miriam . . . took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances.
Ex. xv. 20.

timbrel (tim′brel), v. t.; pret. and pp. timbreled, timbrelled, ppr. timbreling, timbrelling. [< timbrel, n.] To sing to the sound of the timbrel. [Rare.]

The sable-stoled sorcerers bear his worshipt ark.
Milton, Nativity, l. 219.

timbrology (tim-brol′ǒ-ji), n. [< F. timbre, postage-stamp, + -ology.] The science or study of postage-stamps. Encyc. Dict.

timbul, n. Same as timbal.

timburine†, n. Same as timbourine.

time[1] (tīm), n. [Early mod. E. also tyme; < ★ME. time, tyme, < AS. tima, time, season, = Icel. tīmi, time, season, = Norw. time, time, an hour, = Sw. timme, an hour, = Dan. time, an hour, a lesson; with formative suffix -ma, from the √ ti seen in tide: see tide[1], and cf. till[1]. Not connected with L. tempus, time: see tense[1].] 1. The system of those relations which any event has to any other as past, present, or future. This relationship is realistically conceived as a sort of self-subsistent entity. It may be figured as a stream flowing through the field of the present and is often so described: as, the stream of time; the course of time, etc. According to Leibnitz, time is the confused apprehension of a system of relations; but, taking too mathematical a view, he failed to notice that time is not a general idea, but is contracted to the individual system of relations of the events that actually do happen. According to Kant, time (like space) is the form of an intuition; this apprehension of it corrected Leibnitz's oversight, but lost the truth contained in Leibnitz's view. Modern psychology treats of time as an attribute of sensation or character of sense-complexes. Time is personified as an old man, bald-headed but having a forelock, and carrying a scythe and an hour-glass.

Be wyse, ready, and well aduysed,
For tyme tryeth thy troth.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 84.

By a rule as plain as the plain bald pate of father Time himself. Shak., C. of E., ii. 2. 71.

We found this Whale-fishing a costly conclusion: we saw many and spent much time in chasing them, but could not kill any. Capt. John Smith, True Travels, II. 175.

Time is duration set out by measures.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xiv. 17.

Absolute, true, and mathematical Time is conceived by Newton as flowing at a constant rate, unaffected by the speed or slowness of the motions of material things. It is also called Duration.
Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, art. xvii.

2. A part of time considered as distinct from other parts; a period; a space of time: as, a short time; a long time; too little time was allowed; hence, season; particular period: as, summer-time; spring*time*.

Then aftur with-inne a shorte tyme.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 84.

About questions therefore concerning days and times our manner is not to stand at bay with the Church of God demanding wherefore the memory of Paul should be rather kept than the memory of Daniel.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 71.

An illustrious scholar once told me that, in the first lecture he ever delivered, he spoke but half his allotted time, and felt as if he had told all he knew.
O. W. Holmes, Professor, i.

3. A part of time considered as distinct from other parts, whether past, present, or future, and particularly as characterized by the occurrence of some event or series of events; especially, the period in which some notable person, or the person under consideration, lived or was active; age; epoch: as, the time of the flood, of Abraham, or of Moses: often in the plural: as, the times of the Pharaohs.

Also he saith for certayn that in his tyme he had a frend that was auncyent & old, which recounted for trouth that in hys dayes he hadd seen many tymes such thinges.
Rom. of Partenay.

To hold, as 'twere, the mirror up to nature; to show . . . the very age and body of the time his form and pressure. Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2. 27.

The same times that are most renowned for arms are likewise most admired for learning.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 16.

Was it [the Christian religion] not then remarkable in its first times for justice, sincerity, contempt of riches, and a kind of generous honesty?
Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. iii.

From 1813 to 1815 . . . the island was under English rule, and the time of English rule was looked on as a time of freedom, compared with French rule before or with Austrian rule both before and after.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 206.

4. Appointed, allotted, or customary period of years, months, days, hours, etc. Specifically—(a) Allotted span; the present life as distinct from the life to come, or from eternity; existence in this world; the duration of a being.

Make use of time as thou valuest eternity. Fuller.

(b) The space of time needed or occupied in the completion of some course; the interval that elapses between the beginning and the end of something: as, the time between New York and Queenstown is now about six days; the race finished at noon: time, three hours and seven minutes. (c) The period of gestation; also, the natural termination of that period.

Now Elisabeth's full time came that she should be delivered; and she brought forth a son. Luke i. 57.

(d) The period of an apprenticeship, or of some similarly definite engagement: as, the boy served his time with A. B.; to be out of one's time (that is, to cease being an apprentice, be a journeyman). [Colloq.]

The apprentice might wear his cap in his master's presence during the last year of his time.
J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, I. 82.

(e) A term of imprisonment: as, to do time in the penitentiary. [Colloq.]

5. Available or disposable part or period of duration; leisure; sufficiency or convenience of time; hence, opportunity: as, to give one time to finish his remark; to have no time for such things; to ask for time.

Daniel . . . desired of the king that he would give him time. Dan. ii. 16.

I like this place,
And willingly would waste my time in it.
Shak., As you Like it, ii. 4. 95.

Shun. Why, he's of years, though he have little beard.
P. sen. His beard has time to grow.
B. Jonson, Staple of News, ii. 1.

Sir Oliver S. Moses shall give me farther instructions as we go together.
Sir Peter. You will not have much time, for your nephew lives hard by. Sheridan, School for Scandal, iii. 1.

6. A suitable or appropriate point or part of time; fitting season: as, a time for everything; a time to weep and a time to laugh.

Now is tyme, zif it lyke zou, for to telle zou of the Marches and Iles, and dyverse Bestes, and of dyverse folk bezond theise Marches. Mandeville, Travels, p. 142.

Signior, this is no time for you to flatter,
Or me to fool in. Fletcher, Double Marriage, i. 2.

7. Particular or definite point of time; precise hour or moment: as, the time of day; what is the time? choose your own time.

Att that tyme owt of the prese thei were,
To rest them self a season to endure,
Ther eche to other told his aventur.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 2595.

Well, he is gone; he knoweth his fare by this time.
Latimer, 4th Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son. Heb. i. 1.

Good sister, when you see your own time, will you return home? Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, ii. 1.

I shall cut your Throat some time or other, Petulant, about that Business. Congreve, Way of the World, i. 9.

8. An appointed, fixed, or inevitable point or moment of time; especially, the hour of one's departure or death.

His time was come; he ran his race.
Swift, Death of Dr. Swift.

9. A mode of occupying time; also, what occurs in a particular time.

I'm thinking (and it almost makes me mad)
How sweet a time those heathen ladies had. . . .
Cupid was chief of all the deities,
And love was all the fashion in the skies.
Dryden, Epil. to Amphitryon, or the Two Sosias.

10. The state of things at a particular point of time; prevailing state of circumstances: generally in the plural: as, hard times.

Good men, by their gouernment and example, make happie times, in euery degree and state.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 123.

They [the Jews] can subject themselves unto times, and to whatsoever may advance their profit.
Sandys, Travailes, p. 114.

The times are dull with us. The assemblies are in their recess.
Washington, quoted in Bancroft's Hist. Const., I. 453.

11. All time to come; the future. [Rare.]

That brought you forth this boy, to keep your name Living to time. Shak., Cor., v. 3. 127.

12. Reckoning, or method of reckoning, the lapse or course of time: with a qualifying word: as, standard time; mean time; solar or sidereal time.—13. Recurrent instance or occasion: as, many a time has he stood there; hence, a repeated item or sum; a single addition or involution in reckoning; repetition: as, four times four (four repetitions of four).

The good wijf tauȝte hir douȝtir
Ful manye a tyme & ofte
A ful good womman to be.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 36.

There were we beaten three times a weeke with a horse tayle. E. Webbe, Travels (ed. Arber), p. 18.

Many a time and oft
In the Rialto you have rated me
About my moneys and my usances.
Shak., M. of V., i. 3. 107.

14†. Tune; measure.

I have prepar'd
Choice music near her cabinet, and compos'd
Some few lines, set unto a solemn time,
In the praise of imprisonment.
Fletcher (and another), False One, i. 2.

I must fit all these times, or there 's no music.
Middleton, Chaste Maid, ii. 3.

15. In music: (a) Same as rhythm: as, duple time; triple time; common time. (b) Same as duration, especially in metrical relations: as, to hold a tone its full time. (c) Same as tempo[1]: as, to sing a song in quick time. (d) The general movement of a form of composition or of a particular piece, involving its rhythm, its general metrical structure, and its characteristic tempo.—16. In pros., relative duration of utterance as measuring metrical composition; a unit of rhythmic measurement, or a group or succession of such units, applicable to or expressed in language. In modern or accentual poetry the relative time of utterance of successive syllables is not recognized metrically. Every syllable may be considered as quantitatively common or indifferent in time, the only difference taken into account being that of stress or accent (ictus), and the number of syllables alone introducing the idea of measurement. In ancient prosody a unit of time is assumed (varying in actual duration according to the tempo), called the primary or least (minimum) time (χρόνος πρῶτος, ἐλάχιστος), also semeion or mora, or, specifically, a time. A time composed of two, three, etc., primary times (semeia) is called a disemic, trisemic, etc., time. Such times collectively are compound times, as opposed to the primary time as a simple time. As expressed in language, a simple or compound time is a syllable, a simple time being regularly represented by a short syllable, a compound time by a (disemic, trisemic, etc.) long, usually disemic. A time which can be measured in terms of the unit is a rational time; one which cannot be so measured, an irrational time. A compound time in a poetic text may correspond to several simple times in the accompanying music or orchesis, and vice versa. Similarly a simple or compound time in the rhythm may be unrepresented by a syllable or syllables in the text, and is then called an empty time, or pause. Times combine into pedal semeia (thesis and arsis), feet, and cola, all of which are called pedal times. These are measured in terms of the primary time, but not periods, etc.

17. In phren., one of the perceptive faculties. Its alleged organ is situated on either side of eventuality. This gives the power of judging of time, and of intervals in general, supposed to be essential to music and versification. See phrenology.

18. One of the three dramatic unities formerly considered essential in the classical drama. The unity of time consisted in keeping the period embraced in the action of the piece within the limit of twenty-four hours. See unity.

19. In fencing, a division of a movement. Thus, the lunge may be analyzed into three times—(1) straightening the sword arm; (2) carrying the sword-point forward by advancing the right foot; (3) returning foot and hand to the correct position on guard.—Absolute time. See absolute.—Against time. See against.—A good time. (a) A favorable time or opportunity. (b) A pleasant or enjoyable period or experience: also a fine time: often used ironically. [Colloq.]—A high time. See high.—Apparent time, the measure of the day by the apparent positions of the sun: it has had different varieties, but as now spoken of by astronomers it is determined by apparent noon, or the instant of passage of the center of the sun over the meridian.—Astronomical time, mean solar time reckoned from noon through the twenty-four hours.—At the same time. See same.—At times, at distinct intervals of duration.

The Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times.
Judges xiii. 25.

Before time†, formerly; aforetime. See beforetime.

If he haue not be maire byfore tyme, then he to come withoute any cloke, in his skarlet goune.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 415.

Behind the times, behind time. See behind.—Civil time, mean time adapted to civil uses, and distinguished into years, months, days, etc.—Close time. See close-time.—Cockshut time†. See cockshut.—Common time. (a) Milit., the ordinary time taken in marching, distinguished from quick time, which is faster by about twenty steps a minute. (b) In music. See common.—Compound time. See compound measure, under compound.—Equation of time. See equation.—Equinoctial time, the mean longitude of the sun according to Delambre's tables, converted into time at the rate of 360° to the tropical year. This system was invented by Sir John F. W. Herschel.—From time to time, occasionally.—Greenwich time, time as reckoned from the instant of the passage of the sun's center over the meridian of Greenwich near London, England, hence usually called the first meridian. Greenwich time is the time most widely used by mariners in computing latitude and longitude.—Hard times, a period of diminished production, falling prices, hesitation or unwillingness to engage in new business enterprises, and declining faith in the prosperity and soundness of old ones.

Our greatest benefactors . . . must now turn beggars like myself; and so, times are very hard, sir.
Farquhar, Love and a Bottle, i. 1.

High time, full time, a limit of time which is not to be exceeded.

It is high time to wake out of sleep. Rom. xiii. 11.

In good time. (a) At the right moment; in good season; hence, fortunately; happily; luckily.

In good time, here comes the noble duke.
Shak., Rich. III., ii. 1. 45.

Lear. I gave you all—
Reg. And in good time you gave it.
Shak., Lear, ii. 4. 253.

My distresses are so many that I can't afford to part with my spirits; but I shall be rich and splenetic, all in good time. Sheridan, School for Scandal, iv. 1.

(b†) Well and good; just so; very well.

"There," saith he, "even at this day are shewed the ruines of those three tabernacles built according to Peter's desire." In very good time, no doubt!
Fuller, Pisgah Sight, II. vi. 27. (Davies.)

In the nick of time. See nick[3], 2.—In time. (a) In good season; at the right moment; sufficiently early; before it is too late.

Good king, look to 't in time;
She'll hamper thee. Shak., 2 Hen. VI., i. 3. 147.

(b) In the course of things; by degrees; eventually.

In time the rod Becomes more mock'd than fear'd.
Shak., M. for M., i. 3. 26.

Local time, time at any place as determined by the passage of the mean sun (or first point of Aries for sidereal time) over the meridian of that place. Owing to the adoption of Greenwich mean time by British railways, of Paris time by French railways, of some central time in certain other countries, and of standard time by the railways of the United States and Canada, and their general adoption in business centers, local time is now seldom kept in those countries.—Mean time. See mean[3].—Merry time†. See merry[1].—Nautical time. Same as astronomical time, except that the date of the day agrees with the civil or ordinary time for the morning hours, while with astronomical time the date is in the afternoon hours the same as in civil time.—Old time, or old times, time gone by; a date or period long passed.

Is there any thing whereof it may be said, See, this is new? it hath been already of old time, which was before us. Eccl. i. 10.

Out of time, or out of due time, unseasonably.

The Ninevites rebuked not Jonah that he lacked discretion, or that he spake out of time.
Latimer, Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1550.

One born out of due time. 1 Cor. xv. 8.

Physiological, psychophysical, quadruple, quintuple, relative time. See the adjectives.—Railway time, the standard of time-reckoning adopted by railways in making up their time-tables.—Retardation of mean solar time. See retardation.—Sextuple time. See sextuple.—Sidereal time. See sidereal.—Solar time. Same as apparent time.—Standard time, a uniform system of time-reckoning adopted in 1883 by the principal railways of the United States and Canada, and since then by most of the large cities and towns of both countries. By this system the continent is divided into four sections, each extending over 15 degrees of longitude (15 degrees of longitude making a difference in time of exactly one hour), the time prevailing in each section being that of its central meridian—that is, the time of the 75th meridian (called eastern time) prevails in the first section; the time of the 90th meridian (called central time) prevails in the next section; the time of the 105th meridian (called mountain time) prevails in the third section; and the time of the 120th meridian (called Pacific time) prevails in the fourth and most westerly section. In this way it is noon at the same moment in all places in the eastern section (that is, from 7½ degrees east of the 75th meridian to 7½ degrees west of it), while in the central section it is 11 o'clock, in the mountain section 10 o'clock, and in the Pacific section 9 o'clock. The nearer a place is to its central meridian the smaller is the discrepancy between its standard and its local time.—Term time. See term, 6 (b).—That time†, then.

Gaffray that tyme, enbrasing shild and targe,
By malice and wreth his spere faste he shoke,
His coursere spored, no fentise on hym toke.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 4212.

The fullness of time. See fullness.—The last times. See last[5].—The time compass. See compass.—Time about, alternately.—Time enough, in season; early enough.

Stanley at Bosworth-field came time enough to save his life. Bacon.

Time immemorial. See time out of mind.—Time of day. (a) Greeting; salutation appropriate to the time of the day, as "good morning" or "good evening."

Not worth the time of day. Shak., Pericles, iv. 3. 35.

(b) The latest aspect of affairs. [Slang.]—Time of flight. See flight[1].—Time out of mind, or time immemorial. (a) For an indefinitely long period of time past: in law, time beyond legal memory—that is, the time prior to the reign of Richard I. (1189).

There hath byn, tyme owt of mynde, a ffree scole kept within the said Citie, in a grete halle belongyng to the said Guylde, called the Trynite halle.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 205.

The joiner squirrel or old grub,
Time out o' mind the fairies' coachmakers.
Shak., R. and J., i. 4. 69.

(b) For an indefinitely long period.

The Walnut-trees [in New England] are tougher than ours, and last time out of mind.
S. Clarke, Four Chiefest Plantations (1670).

Time policy. See policy[2].—To beat time. See beat[1].—To be master of one's time, to have leisure; be able to spend one's time as one pleases.—To come to time. See come.—To fill time. See fill[1].—To keep time. (a) To record time: as, the watch keeps good time. (b) In music, to beat, mark, or observe the rhythmic accents.

Music do I hear?
Ha, ha! keep time; how sour sweet music is,
When time is broke and no proportion kept!
Shak., Rich. II., v. 5. 42.

(c) To move in unison, as persons walking.—To kill time. See kill[1].—To lose time. (a) To fail by delay to take full advantage of the opportunity afforded by any conjuncture; delay.

The earl lost no time, but marched day and night.
Clarendon.

(b) To go too slow: as, a watch or clock loses time.—To mark time. See mark[1].—To pass the time of day. See pass.—To serve one's time, to serve time. See serve[1].—To spend time, to apply one's energy in any way for the space of time considered.—To take time by the forelock. See forelock[2].—To walk, run, row, or go against time, to walk, run, row, or go, as a horse, a runner, or a crew, as rapidly as possible, in order to ascertain the greatest speed attainable, or the greatest distance which can be passed over in a given time, or to surpass any previous record.—To waste time, to act to no purpose through a considerable space of time.—Tract of time. See tract[1], 1.—Triple time. See rhythm.—Universal time, a system of measuring time which shall be the same for all places on the earth.—What time†, when.

After this, in the Year 180, what Time Lucius was King of this Island, Eluther ius, then Bishop of Rome, sent Faganus and Damianus to him. Baker, Chronicles, p. 3.

★=Syn. 2. Term, while, interval.

time[1] (tīm), v.; pret. and pp. timed, ppr. timing. [< ME. timen, happen, < AS. ge-tīmian, fall out, happen, < tīma, time: see time[1], n. (Cf. tide[1], v., happen, < tide[1], n., time.) In later uses the verb time[1] is from the modern noun.] I. trans. 1. To adapt to the time or occasion; bring, begin, or perform at the proper season or time.

Hippomenes, however, by rightly timing his second and third throw, at length won the race.
Bacon, Physical Fables, iv.

This Piece of Mirth is so well timed that the severest Critick can have nothing to say against it.
Addison, Spectator, No. 279.

2. To regulate as to time.

To the same purpose old Epopeus spoke,
Who overlooked the oars, and timed the stroke.
Addison, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., iii.

He [the farmer] is a slow person, timed to nature, and not to city watches. Emerson, Farming.

3. To ascertain the time, duration, or rate of: as, to time the speed of a horse; to time a race. —4. To measure, as in music or harmony.

II. intrans. 1. To waste time; defer; procrastinate. [Rare.]

They [the ambassadors of Henry II. to the Pope] timed it out all that Spring, and a great part of the next Sommer; when, although they could give the King no great security, yet they advertise him of hope. Daniel, Hist. Eng., p. 95.

2. To keep time; harmonize.

Beat, happy stars, timing with things below.
Tennyson, Maud, xviii. 8.

3. In fencing, to make a thrust upon an opening occurring by an inaccurate or wide motion of the opponent.

time[2]†, n. An obsolete spelling of thyme.

time-alarm (tīm′a-lärm″), n. A contrivance for sounding an alarm at a set time. In a general sense, any striking clock is a time-alarm; in a specific sense, the term is applied to a device for arousing a sleeper, as by striking a bell, firing a pistol, etc.

time-attack (tīm′a-tak″), n. Same as time-thrust.

time-ball (tīm′bâl), n. A ball dropped suddenly from the top of a staff prominently placed, as on the top of an observatory or of a church spire, for the purpose of indicating some exact moment of mean time previously determined upon—1 P. M. being that in general use in Great Britain, and noon in the United States. Since the adoption of standard time in the United States, the dropping of the time-ball at Washington, New York, and Boston indicates the time of mean noon on the 75th meridian west of Greenwich.

time-bargain (tīm′bär″gān), n. A contract for the sale or purchase of merchandise, or of stock, at a future time. These bargains are often mere gambling transactions, carried on from time to time by the payment of the difference between the stipulated price and the actual price on the day fixed for the pretended delivery of the stock or goods, the party buying having no intention of taking over either, and the party selling not possessing what he professes to sell.

A curious example of legal evasion is furnished by time-bargains; and the imposition of the tax directly on the contracts of sale, instead of as at present on the actual transfer, has been strongly urged.
Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 89.

time-beguiling (tīm′bē-gī″ling), a. Making the time pass quickly. [Rare.]

A summer's day will seem an hour but short,
Being wasted in such time-beguiling sport.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 24.

time-bettering (tīm′bet″ėr-ing), a. Improving the state of things; full of innovations. [Rare.]

Some fresher stamp of the time-bettering days.
Shak., Sonnets, lxxxii.

time-bewasted (tīm′bē-wās″ted), a. Used up by time; consumed. [Rare.]

My oil-dried lamp and time-bewasted light.
Shak., Rich. II., i. 3. 221.

time-bill (tīm′bil), n. A time-table.

time-book (tīm′bůk), n. A book in which is kept a record of the time persons have worked.

time-card (tīm′kärd), n. 1. A card having a time-table printed upon it.—2. A card containing blank spaces for name, date, and hour, to be filled up by workmen and given to the timekeeper on their beginning work.

time-detector (tīm′dē-tek″tọr), n. A watch or clock used as a check upon a watchman, and arranged to indicate any neglect or failure in making his rounds. The watch is carried by the man, who has access at certain points in his rounds to keys which can be inserted to mark an inclosed dial-slip. The clock is stationary at some point which the watchman must pass, and he is required at each passage to press a button or peg, which makes some recording mark.

timeful (tīm′fůl), a. [< ME. tymeful; < time[1] + -ful.] Seasonable; timely; sufficiently early.

Interrupting, by his vigilant endeavours, all offer of timeful return towards God.
Raleigh (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 199).

time-fuse (tīm′fūz), n. A fuse calculated to burn a definite length of time. See fuse[2].

time-globe (tīm′glōb), n. In horol., a globe mounted above a clock, and arranged to turn, by means of connections with the clock, once in twenty-four hours: designed to show the time at any point on the globe by means of a stationary dial or ring encircling the globe at the equator, and marked with the hours and minutes.

time-gun (tīm′gun), n. A gun fired as a signal at a fixed hour of the day, or at the time set for any enterprise or undertaking.

time-honored (tīm′on″ord), a. Honored for a long time; venerable and worthy of honor by reason of antiquity and long continuance: as, a time-honored custom.

Where posterity retains
Some vein of that old minstrelsy which breath'd
Through each time-honour'd grove of British oak.
Mason, Poems (ed. 1774), p. 90.

timeist, n. See timist, 1.

timekeeper (tīm′kē″pėr), n. One who or that which marks, measures, or records time. (a) A clock, watch, or chronometer. (b) One who marks or beats time in music. (c) One who notes and records the time at which something takes place, or the time occupied in some action or operation, or the number of hours of work done by each of a number of workmen.

timeless (tīm′les), a. [< time[1] + -less.] 1. Unseasonable; inopportune; untimely.

Some untimely thought did instigate
His all-too-timeless speed. Shak., Lucrece, l. 44.

And by this man, the easy husband,
Pardoned; whose timeless bounty makes him now Stand here. B. Jonson, Volpone, iv. 2.

2. Unmarked by time; eternal; unending; interminable.

This ground, which is corrupted with their steps,
Shall be their timeless sepulchre or mine.
Marlowe, Edward II., i. 2.

Timeless night and chaos.
Young, Night Thoughts, ii. 222.

In other words, that which is timeless and immutable is at different times at different stages of development.
Mind, IX. 85.

3. Referring to no particular time; undated.

In the intention of the writers of these hymns [the Psalms] there can generally be no doubt that it [Messiah] refers to the king then on the throne, or, in hymns of more general and timeless character, to the Davidic king as such (without personal reference to one king).
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 53.

timelessly (tīm′les-li), adv. In a timeless manner. (a) Unseasonably.

O fairest flower, no sooner blown but blasted.
Soft silken primrose, fading timelessly.
Milton, On the Death of a Fair Infant, l. 2.

(b) Without reference to time.

Timelia (tī-mē′li-ä), n. [NL. (Sundevall, 1872), earlier Timalia (Hodgson, 1821 and 1824): from an E. Ind. name.] A genus of Indian oscine birds, of the cichlomorphic or turdoid series, Timelia pileata.

giving name to the Timeliidæ: also called Napodes (Cabanis, 1850). It has been used with the least possible discrimination. The type is T. pileata of Nepal, Sikhim, Burma, Cochin-China, the Malay peninsula, and Java. This and one other species, T. longirostris, now compose the genus in its strictest sense. R. B. Sharpe.

Timeliæ (tī-mē′li-ē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Timelia.] A section of Timeliidæ, regarded as the most representative of that so-called family, with about 30 genera. R. B. Sharpe.

Timeliidæ (tim-ē-lī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Timelia + -idæ.] A family of Old World thrush-like birds and others, named from the genus Timelia, of no further definition. It is a mere refuge for birds not located elsewhere to general satisfaction, and has come to be known as "the ornithological waste-basket." Among the more than a thousand species treated as Timeliidæ by the latest monographer, of very numerous genera and various sections, a good many unquestionably belong to recognized families, as Turdidæ, Sylviidæ, Troglodytidæ, etc. A loose English name of the group, and especially of its central section, is babbling thrushes. See babbler, 2, Brachypodinæ, Liotrichidæ, and Timeliæ, and cuts under Pnoepyga, Tesia, and Timelia. Also called Timalidæ.

I consider it impossible to divide the birds hitherto referred or allied to the typical Timeliidæ into well-defined or definable groups.
R. B. Sharpe, Cat. Timeliidæ, British Museum, p. 1.

timeliine (tī-mel′i-in), a. [< Timelia + -ine[1].] Related or belonging to the Timeliidæ.

Birds which are true Wrens, and others which are truly Timeliine.
R. B. Sharpe, Cat. Birds, Brit. Mus. (1881), VI. 301.

timeliness (tīm′li-nes), n. The state or property of being timely; seasonableness; the being in good time.

timeling† (tīm′ling), n. [< time[1] + -ling[1].] A time-server. [Rare.]

They also cruelly compel divers of the ministers which are faint-hearted, and were, as it seemeth, but timelings, serving rather the time (as the manner of the worldlings is) than marrying in Thy fear, to do open penance before the people. Becon, Works, III. 235. (Davies.) time-lock (tīm′lok), n. See lock[1].

timely (tīm′li), a. [< ME. timely, tymely, tymli, timely, seasonable (= Icel. tīmaligr = Sw. timlig = Dan. timelig, temporal); < time[1] + -ly[1].] 1. Seasonable; opportune; just in time; in good time.

The Secund day suyng, sais me the lyne,
The Troiens full tymli tokyn the feld.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 9629.

Clorin, come forth, and do a timely grace
To a poor swain.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, v. 5.

I also give my Pilgrims timely help.
Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 245.

2†. Early.

And therfor, savyng your better avice, I had lever ye were at London a weke the rather and tymelyer then a weke to late. Paston Letters, I. 338.

Happy were I in my timely death,
Could all my travels warrant me they live.
Shak., C. of E., i. 1. 139.

3†. Passing, as time.

A Diall told the timely howres. Spenser, F. Q., I. iv. 4.

4†. Keeping time or measure.

And many Bardes, that to the trembling chord
Can tune their timely voices cunningly.
Spenser, F. Q., I. v. 3.

timely (tīm'li), adv. [< ME. timliche; < timely, a.] 1. Early; soon.

He did command me to call timely on him.
Shak., Macbeth, ii. 3. 51.

2. In good time; opportunely.

These, when their black crimes they went about,
First timely charmed their useless conscience out.
Dryden, Astræa Redux, l. 190.

You have rebuk'd me timely, and most friendly.
Brome, Jovial Crew, ii.

The next Imposture may not be so timely detected.
Congreve, Way of the World, v. 6.

3†. Leisurely.

timely-parted (tīm'li-pär″ted), a. Having died a natural death. [Rare.]

Oft have I seen a timely-parted ghost,
Of ashy semblance, meagre, pale, and bloodless; . . .
But see, his face is black and full of blood, . . .
It cannot be but he was murder'd here.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 2. 161.

timenog, n. Same as timenoguy.

timenoguy (tī-men'ō-gī), n. [Also timenog; origin obscure. The form timenoguy appar. simulates guy[1].] Naut., a rope stretched from one place to another to prevent gear from getting foul; especially, a rope made fast to the stock of the waist-anchor, to keep the tacks and sheets from fouling on the stock.

timeous, timeously. See timous, timously.

timepiece (tīm'pēs), n. Any machine or apparatus by which the progress of time is recorded, as a clepsydra or a time-candle; in ordinary use, a watch or clock.

time-pleaser (tīm'plē″zėr), n. One who complies with the prevailing opinions of the time, whatever they may be.

Scandal d the suppliants for the people, call'd them Time-pleasers, flatterers, foes to nobleness.
Shak., Cor., iii. 1. 45.

timer (tī'mėr), n. 1. One who keeps or measures and records time; a timekeeper.

To make a record in this country requires the presence of three timers or measurers, and two of these must agree, or the intermediate one of the three be taken as the correct one. The Century, XL. 205.

2. A form of stop-watch for recording or indicating short intervals of time. It shows not actual time, but only relative time, as the time between the beginning and the end of a race, of a trial of speed, etc.

timerous†, timersome†, a. See timorous, timorsome.

time-sense (tīm'sens), n. The consciousness of time and time-relations.

All psychophysic experiments, especially those requiring comparison and those upon the time-sense and the like, involve memory.
W. H. Burnham, Amer. Jour. Psychol., II. 603.

time-server (tīm'sėr″vėr), n. One who acts conformably to times and seasons: now generally applied to one who meanly and for selfish ends adapts his opinions and manners to the times; one who panders to the ruling power.

No government has ever been, or ever can be, wherein timeservers and blockheads will not be uppermost.
Dryden, Third Miscellany, Ded.

=Syn. See definitions of temporizer and trimmer.

time-serving (tīm'sėr″ving), n. An acting conformably to times and seasons; now, usually, an obsequious compliance with the humors of men in power, which implies a surrender of one's independence, and sometimes of one's integrity.

By impudence and time-serving let them climb up to advancement in despite of virtue.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 375.

Trimming and time-serving . . . are but two words for the same thing. South.

time-serving (tīm'sėr″ving), a. Characterized by an obsequious or too ready compliance with the times, and especially with the will or humors of those in authority; obsequious; truckling.

time-servingness (tīm'sėr″ving-nes), n. The state or character of being time-serving. Roger North.

time-sight (tīm'sīt), n. Naut., an observation of the altitude of any heavenly body for the purpose of deducing the time and consequently the longitude.

time-signal (tīm'sig″nal), n. A signal operated from an observatory to indicate the time of day to persons at distant points.

time-signature (tīm'sig″nā-tūr), n. In musical notation, same as rhythmical signature (which see, under rhythmical).

time-table (tīm'tā″bl), n. 1. A tabular statement or scheme, showing the time when certain things are to take place or be attended: as, a school time-table, showing the hours for study in each class, etc.—2. Specifically—(a) A printed table showing the times at which trains on a line of railway arrive at and depart from the various stations. (b) A collection of such tables for the railway passenger traffic of an entire country, or of a district of country of greater or less extent. Also called railway- or railroad-guide. [Eng.]—3. In musical notation, a table of notes arranged so as to show their relative duration or time-value. Such tables were especially used in connection with the complicated metrical experiments of the early mensural music of the middle ages; but the modern system of notes is frequently exhibited in tabular form. See note[1], 13.—Time-table chart, a chart used for determining the times at which trains will pass way-stations. All stations are expressed by vertical lines drawn to scale of distance, and time by horizontal lines crossing these. If a train leaves station A at 9 and arrives at E at 10, a line drawn from the junction of lines A and 9 to lines E and 10 will cross the lines of way-stations B, C, and D and indicate the time of passing.

time-thrust (tīm'thrust), n. [Tr. F. coup de temps.] In fencing, a thrust made while the opponent draws his breath just before moving his hand to attack, or while his blade is beginning to stir. This is a very delicate thrust, and must be executed with the nicest judgment, neither too soon nor too late, but just "in time." In the time-thrust the foot is generally moved forward in a lunge; in the stop-thrust (which see)—made after the opponent has begun to lunge—the foot is usually at rest.

time-value (tīm'val″ū), n. In musical notation, the relative duration indicated by a note. See note[1], rhythm, and meter[2].

time-work (tīm'wėrk), n. Labor paid for by the day or the hour, in opposition to piece-work, or labor paid for by the amount produced.

timid (tim'id), a. [< F. timide = Sp. tímido = Pg. It. timido, < L. timidus, full of fear, fearful, timid, < timere, fear.] Fearful; easily alarmed; timorous; shy.

Poor is the triumph o'er the timid hare.
Thomson, Autumn, l. 401.

A timid creature, lax of knee and hip,
Whom small disturbance whitens round the lip.
O. W. Holmes, The Moral Bully.

timidity (ti-mid'i-ti), n. [< F. timidité = It. timidità, < L. timidita(-t)s, fearfulness, timidness, < timidus, fearful, timid: see timid.] The character of being timid, or easily frightened or daunted; cowardice; fearfulness; timorousness; shyness.

This proceedeth from nothing else but extreame folly and timidity of heart. Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 234.

"Viglius," wrote Margaret to Philip, "is so much afraid of being cut to pieces that his timidity has become incredible." Motley, Dutch Republic, I. 574.

=Syn. See bashfulness.

timidly (tim'id-li), adv. In a timid or apprehensive manner; without boldness.

timidness (tim'id-nes), n. The state or quality of being timid; timidity.

timidous† (tim'i-dus), a. [< L. timidus, timid: see timid.] Timid.

His lordship knew him to be a mere lawyer, and a timidous man. Roger North, Lord Guilford, II. 31. (Davies.) timing (tī'ming), n. [Verbal n. of time[1], v.] In the design and construction of machinery, the proper adjustment of the parts of any machine so that its operations will follow in a given order or at required intervals so as to produce a given result, as in the igniting of explosive mixtures in gas-engines at desired points of the stroke, and the like.

timish† (tī'mish), a. [< time[1] + -ish.] Modish, fashionable.

A timish gentleman accoutered with sword and peruke . . . had a great desire to discourse with him.
Life of Lodowick Muggleton, 1676 (Harl. Misc., I. 612). (Davies.)

timist (tī'mist), n. [< time[1] + -ist.] 1. In music, a performer considered with reference to his power to observe rhythmical and metrical relations. Thus, a violinist may have an accurate sense of intonation, and yet be a poor timist. Also timeist.

Neither the one [singer] nor the other are, by any means, perfect timists. Goldsmith, Visit to Vauxhall.

She [the quail] was a perfect timeist.
C. Reade, Never too Late, lxiv.

The bystanders joined in the song, an interminable recitative, as usual in the minor key; and as Orientals are admirable timists, it sounded like one voice.
R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 449.

2†. One who conforms to the times; a time-server.

A timist . . . hath no more of a conscience then feare, and his religion is not his but the prince's. He reverenceth a courtiers servants servant.
Sir T. Overbury, Characters, a Timist.

timmen (tim'en), n. [A var. of (or error for?) tammin, tamin.] Same as tamin, 1.

timmer. A dialectal form of timber[1], timber[2].

timocracy (tī-mok'rā-si), n. [= F. timocratie, < Gr. τιμοκρατία, a state in which honors are distributed according to a rating of property; also, fancifully, in Plato, a state in which the love of honor is the ruling principle; < τιμή, honor, worth, dignity, office, + κρατεῖν, govern.] A form of government in which a certain amount of property is requisite as a qualification for office. The word has also been used for a government in which the ruling class, composed of the noblest and most honorable citizens, struggle for preëminence among themselves.

An innovation of great extent and importance was the so-called timocracy, according to which a certain amount of means was a necessary qualification for a share in the offices of state. Von Ranke, Univ. Hist. (trans.), p. 142.

timocratic (tim-ō-krat'ik), a. [< Gr. τιμοκρατικός, pertaining to or favoring timocracy, < τιμοκρατία, timocracy: see timocracy.] Of or pertaining to timocracy.

timon† (tī'mon), n. [< ME. temon, < OF. timon, temon, F. timon, a pole, staff, the handle of a rudder, the rudder, = Pr. timo = Sp. timón = Pg. timão = It. timone, < L. temo(n-), a beam, pole.] The helm or rudder of a boat.

Tournynge with suche vyolence yt with the jumpe and stroke of ye falle of ye galye to the rok the sterne, called the temon, sterte and flewe frome the hokes.
Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 76.

timoneer† (tī-mō-nēr'), n. [< F. timonier = Sp. timonero = Pg. timoneiro, temoneiro = It. timoniere, < ML. *timonarius, temonarius, a steersman, < L. temo(n-), a beam, pole, > F. timon, etc., helm, rudder: see timon.] Naut., a helmsman; also, one on the lookout who gives steering-orders to the helmsman.

While o'er the foam the ship impetuous flies,
The helm th' attentive timoneer applies.
Falconer, Shipwreck, ii.

Timonist (tī'mon-ist), n. [< Timon (see def.), < L. Timon, < Gr. Τίμων, + -ist.] A misanthrope; literally, one like Timon of Athens, the hero of Shakspere's play of the same name.

I did it to retire me from the world,
And turn my muse into a Timonist.
Dekker, Satiromastix.

Timonize (tī'mon-īz), v. i.; pret. and pp. Timonized, ppr. Timonizing. [< Timon (see Timonist) + -ize.] To play the misanthrope.

I should be tempted to Timonize, and clap a satyr upon our whole species. Gentleman Instructed, p. 306. (Davies.)

Timor deer. See deer.

timorosity† (tim-ō-ros'i-ti), n. [Early mod. E. tymerositie; < ML. timorosita(t-)s*, < timorosus, fearful: see timorous.] Timorousness.

Timorositie is as well whan a man feareth suche thinges as be nat to be feared, as also whan he feareth thinges to be feared more than nedeth.
Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, iii. 8.

timoroso (tim-ō-rō'sō), a. [It.: see timorous.] In music, timid; hesitating: noting passages to be so rendered.

timorous (tim'ō-rus), a. [Early mod. E. also timerous; < ME. timorous*, < OF. timorous* = Sp. Pg. temeroso = It. timoroso, < ML. timorosus, fearful, < L. timor, fear, < timere, fear: see timid.] 1. Fearful; timid; shy; shrinking.

They were wont to be very timorous and fearful upon the sea, nor to venture upon it but only in the summer time. Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), i.

Like a timorous thief, most fain would steal
What law does vouch mine own.
Shak., All's Well, ii. 5. 86.

2. Betokening or proceeding from lack of boldness or courage; characterized by fear; weakly hesitant: as, timorous doubts.

Rod. Here is her father's house; I'll call aloud.
Iago. Do, with like timorous accent and dire yell
As when . . . the fire
Is spied in populous cities. Shak., Othello, i. 1. 75.

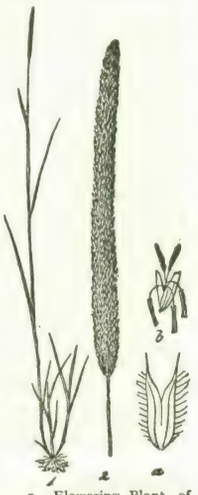
Against all timorous counsels he [Lincoln] had the courage to seize the moment.
Emerson, Emancipation Proclamation.

timorously (tim'ō-rus-li), adv. In a timorous manner; fearfully; timidly; without boldness or confidence.

timorousness (tim'ō-rus-nes), n. The state of being timorous; timidity; want of courage.



Timorousness is called caution, rashness is called quickness of spirit, covetousness is frugality.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 846.

timorsome (tim'or-sum), a. [Also timoursum, timersome, timmersome; an accom. form of timorous, as if < L. timor, fear (see timorous), + -some.] Easily frightened; timid. Scott, Pirate, xviii. [Scotch.]

Timothean (ti-mō′thē-an), n. [< L. Timotheus, < Gr. Τιμόθεος, Timotheus (> E. Timothy), + -an.] One of a sect of Alexandrian Monophysites founded by Timotheus Ælurus in the fifth century.

timothy (tim′ō-thi), n. [Abbr. of timothy-grass.] Same as timothy-grass.

timothy-grass (tim′ō-thi-gras), n. [So called from Timothy Hanson, who carried the seed from New York to the Carolinas about 1720.] One of the most valuable of all fodder-grasses, Phleum pratense, otherwise known as cattail or herd's-grass: native in parts of the old world and in the northeastern United States, though widely cultivated. It varies in height from one foot to three or more. Though somewhat hard and coarse when fully ripe, it is highly nutritious, and well relished by stock, if cut in flower or immediately after. It is often planted with clover; but the two do not ripen at the same time. It is the favorite and prevailing meadow-grass through a large part of the United States.

1, Flowering Plant of Timothy-grass (Phleum pratense); 2, the spicate inflorescence; a, the empty glumes; b, a floret.

timous (tī′mus), a. [Also less prop., but in Sc. legal use commonly, timeous; < time[1] + -ous. Prob. suggested by wrongous, righteous, where -ous, -e-ous is an accommodation of a diff. suffix.] Timely; seasonable. [Obsolete and rare, except in Scottish legal and commercial phraseology.]

By a wise and timous inquisition, the peccant humours and humourists may be discovered, purged, or cut off.
Bacon.

timously (tī′mus-li), adv. [Also less prop. timeously; < timous + -ly[2].] In a timous manner; seasonably; in good time. [Obsolete and rare, except in Scottish legal and commercial phraseology.]

If due care be had, to follow timeously the advise of an honest and experienced physician, a period certainly may be brought about to most chronical distempers.
Cheyne, On Health, p. 174. (Latham.)

Your warning is timeously made.
J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, II. 432.

tim-whisky (tim′hwis-ki), n. [< tim (origin obscure—perhaps a jocose use of Tim, a familiar name) + whisky[1].] A light one-horse chaise without a head. Also tim-whiskey.

A journey to Tyburn in a tim-whisky and two would have concluded your travels. Foote, The Cozeners, i.

It is not like the difference between a Baptist and an Anabaptist, which Sir John Danvers said is much the same as that between a Whiskey and a Tim-Whiskey—that is to say, no difference at all.
Southey, The Doctor, interchapter xiv.

★ tin (tin), n. and a. [Early mod. E. tinne, tynne; < ME. tin, < AS. tin = MD. ten, D. tin = MLG. tin, ten, LG. tinn = OHG. MHG. zin, G. zinn = Icel. tin = Sw. tenn = Dan. tin; root unknown. The Ir. tinne is from E., and the F. étain is of other origin, = Ir. stan = W. ystaen = Bret. stean, < L. stannum, tin: see stannum.] I. n. 1. Chemical symbol, Sn (stannum); atomic weight, 119. A metal nearly approaching silver in whiteness and luster, highly malleable, taking a high polish, fusing at 450° F., and having a specific gravity of about 7.3. It is inferior to all the other so-called useful metals, excepting lead, in ductility and tenacity; but, owing to the fact that it is but little affected by the atmosphere at ordinary temperature, it is extensively used for culinary vessels, especially in the form of tin-plate, which is sheet-iron or -steel coated with tin, the former giving the strength and the latter the desired agreeable luster and color and the necessary resistance to oxidation under the conditions to which vessels used in cooking are ordinarily exposed. (See tin-plate.) Tin forms a part of several very important alloys, especially bronze, and also pewter and Britannia metal, both formerly extensively used, but now of less importance. Native tin occurs, if at all (which has not been definitely ascertained), in very small quantity, and is certainly of no economical importance. The sulphuret of tin (tin pyrites, or stannite, a mixture of the isomorphous sulphurets of tin, iron, copper, and zinc) is found in various localities, but nowhere in abundance, and it is of no importance as an ore. All the tin of commerce is obtained from the dioxid, the cassiterite of the mineralogist and the tinstone of the miner. This metal has, however, been found in various rare minerals in small quantity, as also in some mineral waters and in a few meteorites. Tinstone is a mineral resisting decomposition in a remarkable degree, hence fragments mechanically separated from veinstone or rock containing it remain in the debris unchanged in character, and like gold they can be separated by washing from the sands or gravel in which they occur: this operation in the case of tin ore is usually called streaming. The ore of tin is remarkable in that it occurs quite frequently disseminated through granite or greisen (a metamorphosed granitoid rock), in the form of stockwork deposits, and not concentrated into regular veins; it is also very generally accompanied by certain minerals, especially wolfram, schorl, topaz, and lithia mica. Tin is not a very generally distributed metal, and the regions producing it in considerable quantity are few in number. The Straits Settlements, Bolivia, Banca, Cornwall, Australia, South Africa, China, and Billiton furnish the principal supply of this metal, of which the production in 1911 was about 123,000 short tons. To this may be added some 30,000 short tons of secondary tin, the world's probable recovery from processes of manufacture. Tin is chemically related to the metals titanium, zirconium, and thorium, and also to the non-metallic element silicon.

I found many stones wherein I plainly perceived the mettall of tinne. Coryat, Crudities, I. 92.

2. Collectively, thin plates of iron covered with tin. See tin-plate.

O see na thou yon bonny bower, tin (tin), v. t.; pret. and pp. tinned, ppr. tinning. [< tin, n.] 1. To cover or overlay with tin; coat with tin.

The work is divided into ten books, of which the first treats of soups and pickles, and amongst other things shows that sauce-pans were tinned before the time of Pliny. W. King, Art of Cookery, letter ix.

2. To put up, pack, or preserve in tins; can: as, to tin condensed milk; to tin provisions.

In practice there are several processes of tinning food, but the general method adopted is everywhere uniform in principle. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 708.

tinaget, n. [< Sp. tinaja, a jar: see tinaja.] A large earthenware jar.

It is not unknowne vnto you, my brethren, howe John of Padilla passed this way, and howe his souldiers have left me neuer a henne, haue eaten me a fliech of bacon, [and] haue drunke out a whole tinage of wine.
Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 241.

Tinamidæ (ti-nam′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tinamus + -idæ.] The only family of dromæognathous carinate birds, taking name from the genus Tinamus, and peculiar to South America; the tinamous. The structure of the skull and especially of the bony palate is unique among carinate birds, and resembles that of ratite birds (see Dromæognathæ); but the sternum has a very large keel, like that of gallinaceous birds, and in many other respects the tinamous are related to the Gallinæ, with which they used to be classed. There are many anatomical peculiarities. The tail is quite short, or even entirely concealed by the coverts: whence a synonym of the family, Crypturidæ, and the ordinal or subordinal name Crypturi. The species, about 50 in number, are referred to several genera—Tinamus and Crypturus, the two largest, with Nothocercus, Rhynchotus, Nothura, Taoniscus, Tinamotis, and Eudromia (or Calopezus). See tinamou, and cuts under Crypturus, dromæognathous, Rhynchotus, tinamou, and Tinamus.

Tinamomorphæ (tin″a-mō-môr′fē), n. pl. [NL., < Tinamus + Gr. μορφή, form.] The Tinamidæ rated as a superfamily.

tinamou (tin′a-mö), n. [= Dan. tinamu, < F. tinamou; from a S. Amer. name.] A South American dromæognathous carinate bird; any member of the Tinamidæ, resembling a gallinaceous or rasorial bird, and playing the part of one in the countries it inhabits, where the true grouse are entirely wanting. These birds are called partridges by sportsmen, and some of them are known by the native name ynambu, as Rhynchotus rufescens, the largest and one of the best-known species. The smallest is the pygmy tinamou, Taoniscus nanus, about 6 inches long. The martineta is a crested tinamou, Calopezus elegans. See also cuts under Crypturus, Rhynchotus, dromæognathous, and Tinamus.

Crested Tinamou (Calopezus elegans).

Tinamus (tin′a-mus), n. [NL. (Latham, 1790), < F. tinamou.] The name-giving genus of Ti- namidæ, formerly including all these birds, now restricted to such large species as T. major or brasiliensis, about 18 inches long.

tin-bath (tin′bȧth), n. See bath[1].

tin-bound (tin′bound), v. t. To mark the boundaries of, preparatory to mining tin—a process by which an undertaker sets up a legal right to mine the unworked tin under a piece of waste land, on paying royalty to the owner: as, to tin-bound a claim. [Cornwall, Eng.]

In Cornwall this is called tin-bounding, from the setting out of the working by bounds, which is the adventurer's first step towards establishing his claim.
F. Pollock, Land Laws, p. 50.

tin-bound (tin′bound), n. Same as bound[1], 3.

Tinca (ting′kä), n. [NL. (Cuvier), < LL. tinca, a small fish identified as the tench: see tench.] 1. A genus of cyprinoid fishes; the tenches. See cut under tench.—2. [l. c.] A fish of this genus.

tincal, tinkal (ting′kal), n. [< Malay tingkal, Hind. and Pers. tinkār, late Skt. ṭankana, borax.] Borax in its crude or unrefined state: so called in commerce. It is an impure sodium tetraborate or pyroborate, consisting of small crystals of a yellowish color, and is unctuous to the feel. Employed from very early times in soldering metals.

tinchel, tinchill (tin′chel, tin′chil), n. [< Gael. Ir. timchioll, circuit, compass; as adv. and prep., around, about.] In Scotland, a circle of sportsmen who, by surrounding a great space and gradually closing in, bring a number of deer together.

We'll quell the savage mountaineer,
As their Tinchel cows the game!
Scott, L. of the L., vi. 17.

tinclad (tin'klad), n. [A humorous name, after ironclad; < tin + clad.] In the civil war in the United States, a gunboat protected by very light plating of metal, used on the western rivers. [Colloq.]

He [Eads] converted . . . seven transports into what were called tinclads, or musket-proof gunboats.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LVI. 263.

tinct (tingkt), v. t. [< L. tinctus, pp. of tingere, dye, tinge: see tinge. Cf. taint[1], v.] To tinge or tint, as with color; hence, figuratively, to imbue. [Obsolete or archaic.]

I will but . . . tinct you the tip,
The very tip o' your nose.
B. Jonson, Fortunate Isles.

Some bencher, tincted with humanity.
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, Ded.

tinct (tingkt), a. [< L. tinctus, pp.: see the verb.] Tinged.

The blew in black, the greene in gray is tinct.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., November.

tinct (tingkt), n. [< L. tinctus, dyeing, < tingere, pp. tinctus, dye: see tinct, v., tinge. Cf. taint[1], tint[1], doublets of tinct.] 1. Tint; tinge; coloring; hue. [Obsolete or poetical.]

All the devices blazon'd on the shield
In their own tinct.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

2†. A tincture; an essence; specifically, the grand elixir of the alchemists.

Plutus himself,
That knows the tinct and multiplying medicine.
Shak., All's Well, v. 3. 102.

How much unlike art thou Mark Antony!
Yet, coming from him, that great medicine hath
With his tinct gilded thee. Shak., A. and C., i. 5. 37.

★tinction (tingk'shon), n. [< L. as if tinctio(n-), < tingere, dye: see tinge.] A preparation for dyeing; coloring matter in a state for use; that which imparts color. [Recent.]

It also colors somewhat under the same application of the tinction. Amer. Nat., Feb., 1888, p. 117.

tinctorial (tingk-tō'ri-al), a. [< F. tinctorial, < L. tinctorius, < (LL.) tinctor, a dyer, < tingere, pp. tinctus, dye: see tinge. Cf. taintor.] Pertaining or relating to color or dyeing; producing or imparting color.

Alizarin, the chief tinctorial principle of madder.
Encyc. Brit., IV. 687.

Alumina cannot be called a tinctorial or colour-giving matter. W. Crookes, Dyeing and Calico-Printing, p. 142.

tincturation (tingk-tū-rā'shon), n. [< tincture + -ation.] The preparation of a tincture; the treatment of a substance by solution in a menstruum, especially alcohol or ether. [Rare.]

Odorous substances yield their odours to spirit by tincturation — that is, by putting the fragrant material into the spirit, and allowing it to remain there for a period till the alcohol has extracted all the scent. Ure, Dict., III. 537.

tincture (tingk'tūr), n. [= F. teinture = Sp. Pg. It. tintura, < L. tinctura, a dyeing, < tingere, pp. tinctus, dye: see tinct, tinge. Cf. tainture, an older form.] 1. The color with which anything is imbued or impregnated; natural or distinctive coloring; tint; hue; shade of color.

For, deep dy'd in his mighty precious Blood,
It keeps the pow'r and tincture of the flood.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, iii. 32.

The faded rose each spring receives
A fresh red tincture on her leaves.
Carew, To A. L.

Clouds of all tincture, rocks and sapphire sky,
Confused, commingled, mutually inflamed.
Wordsworth, Excursion, ii.

2. In her., one of the metals, colors, or furs used in heraldic achievements. The metals are or (gold) and argent (silver); the colors, gules (red), azure (blue), sable (black), vert (green), purpure (purple), sanguine or murrey (blood-red), and tenné or tenney (tawny, orange); and the furs, ermine, ermines, erminois, pean, vair, counter-vair, potent, and counter-potent. (See these words, and also fur[1], 7.) Of the colors, the first three are the most common, and the last two are very exceptional. Sable is considered by some writers as partaking of the nature both of metal and of color. In modern usage (from the sixteenth century), in representations in black and white, as by engraving, argent is indicated by a plain surface, and the other tinctures by conventional arrangements of lines, etc., as in the cut. A law of heraldry seldom violated provides that the tincture of a bearing must be a metal if the field is a color, and vice versa. See false heraldry, under false.

Heraldic Tinctures.
1, or; 2, argent; 3, gules; 4, azure; 5, sable; 6, vert; 7, purpure; 8, sanguine or murrey; 9, 10, tenné or tawny.

The first English examples of seals with lines in the engraving to indicate the tinctures are said to be on some of those attached to the death warrant of Charles I., 1648–9.
Trans. Hist. Soc. Lancashire and Cheshire, N. S., V. 52.

3. Something exhibiting or imparting a tint or shade of color; colored or coloring matter; pigment. [Obsolete or rare.]

These waters wash from the rocks such glistering tinctures that the ground in some places seemeth as guilded.
Capt. John Smith, Works, I. 115.

4. Infused or derived quality or tone; distinctive character as due to some intermixture or influence; imparted tendency or inclination: used of both material and immaterial things; in alchemy, etc., a supposed spiritual principle or immaterial substance whose character or quality may be infused into material things, then said to be tinctured: as, tincture of the "Red Lion."

From what particular mineral they [natural baths] receive tincture, as sulphur, vitriol, steel, or the like.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

The tincture I early receiv'd from generous and worthy parents, and the education they gave me, disposing . . . me to the love of letters.
Evelyn, To the Countess of Sunderland.

Lastly, to walk with God doth increase the love of God in the soul, which is the heavenly tincture, and inclineth it to look upward. Baxter, Divine Life, ii. 6.

5. A shade or modicum of a quality or of the distinctive quality of something; a coloring or flavoring; a tinge; a taste; a spice; a smack: as, a tincture of garlic in a dish.

A tincture of malice in our natures makes us fond of furnishing every bright idea with its reverse.
Swift, Tale of a Tub, viii.

6. A fluid containing the essential principles or elements of some substance diffused through it by solution; specifically, in med., a solution of a vegetable, an animal, or sometimes a mineral substance, in a menstruum of alcohol, sulphuric ether, or spirit of ammonia, prepared by maceration, digestion, or (now most commonly) percolation. Tinctures are also often prepared, especially on the continent of Europe, by the addition of alcohol to the expressed juices of plants. According to the menstruum, tinctures are distinguished as alcoholic, ethereal, and ammoniated tinctures; and when wine is used they are called medicated wines. Compound tinctures are those in which two or more ingredients are submitted to the action of the solvent. Simple tinctures are such as contain the essential principles of but one substance in solution.

This little gallipot
Of tincture, high rose tincture.
B. Jonson, Fortunate Isles.

Bestucheff's nervous tincture, an ethereal solution of iron chlorid, formerly much used in gout and in states of nervous depression. Also called golden tincture and Klaproth's tincture.—Bitter tincture, a composition of gentian, centaury, bitter orange-peel, orange-berries, and zedoary-root, extracted in alcohol.—Fleming's tincture, a strong tincture of aconite.—Greenough's tincture, a tooth-wash containing alum, bitter almond, logwood, orris-root, horse-radish, oxalate of potash, cassia-berries, and cochineal, extracted in alcohol.—Hatfield's tincture, a tincture of guaiac and soap.—Huxham's tincture, compound tincture of cinchona.—Mother tincture, in homeopathic pharmacy, the strong tincture from which the dilutions are made.—Red tincture. Same as great elixir (which see, under elixir, 1).—Rymer's cardiac tincture, tincture of rhubarb and aloes, containing in addition camphor, capsicum, cardamom, and sulphuric acid.—Stomachic tincture. (a) Compound tincture of cardamom. (b) Bitter tincture.—Volatile tincture of bark, a tincture containing cinchona and aromatic spirit of ammonia.—Warburg's tincture, an alcoholic preparation formed of a large number of ingredients, among which are quinine, aloes, rhubarb, gentian, myrrh, and camphor. It is used as a substitute for quinine in malarial fever and other disorders.—White tincture. Same as lesser elixir (which see, under elixir, 1).—Whytt's tincture, a compound tincture containing cinchona, gentian, and orange-peel.

tincture (tingk'tūr), v. t.; pret. and pp. tinctured, ppr. tincturing. [< tincture, n.] 1. To imbue with color; impart a shade of color to; tinge; tint; stain.

The rest of the Iles are replenished with such like; very rocky, and much tinctured stone like Minerall.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 106.

A little black paint will tincture and spoil twenty gay colours. Watts.

Boys with apples, cakes, candy, and rolls of variously tinctured lozenges. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xvii.

2. To give a peculiar taste, flavor, or character to; imbue; impregnate; season.

Early were our minds tinctured with a distinguishing sense of good and evil; early were the seeds of a divine love, and holy fear of offending, sown in our hearts.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. xviii.

His manners . . . are tinctured with some strange inconsistencies. Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xxvi.

3. To taint; corrupt. [Rare.]

Also called pityriasis versicolor.

Tinea[2] (tin'ē-ä), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1775), < L. tinea, a gnawing worm, a moth: see tinea[1].] 1. A notable genus of moths, typical of the family Tineidæ and superfamily Tineina. It was formerly coextensive with the larger group, but is now restricted to species with thickly hairy head, no ocelli, antennæ shorter than the fore wings, palpi elbowed, their middle joint with a bristle at the tip, and pointed fore wings with twelve veins. In this sense there are about 100 species, of which 40 inhabit North America. The larvæ live in decaying wood, fungi, cloth, feathers, and dried fruit, working usually in silken galleries, and in some instances carrying cases made of silk and the substances upon which they have been feeding. T. pellionella, one of the commonest of the cosmopolitan clothes-moths, is an example of the case-bearers. T. granella is a cosmopolitan pest to stored grain. See cuts under clothes-moth and corn-moth. 2. [l. c.] A moth of this genus or some related one; a tineid.

tinean (tin'ē-an), a. and n. [< Tinea[2] + -an.] Same as tineid.

tined (tīnd), a. [< tine[7] + -ed[2].] Furnished with tines: used especially in combination: as, three-tined.

tine-grass (tīn'gràs), n. See tine[3].

tineid (tin'ē-id), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining or related to the Tineidæ in a broad sense: as, a tineid fauna; tineid characters.

II. n. A tineid moth; any member of the Tineidæ, as a clothes-moth.

Tineidæ (ti-nē'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1819), < Tinea[2] + -idæ.] A family of heterocerous lepidopterous insects or moths. It was at first coextensive with the superfamily Tineina, but is now restricted to forms having the antennæ not stretched forward when at rest, the basal joint of the antennæ not extending to the eye, the last joint of the maxillary palpi short and thick, the labial palpi strongly developed, and the fore wings long. The larvæ either live in silken tubes or carry cases, and only those of the genus Phylloporia are leaf-miners. The principal genera are Scardia, Lampronia, Incurvaria, and Tinea. See cuts under clothes-moth and corn-moth.

Tineina (tin-ē-ī'nä), n. pl. [NL., < Tinea[2] + -ina[2].] A very large and wide-spread group of microlepidopterous insects, including the leaf-miners, clothes-moths, etc. They have slender bodies, long, narrow, often pointed wings, with long fringes, and often marked with rich metallic colors. They include the smallest moths known, and even the largest species are comparatively small. Some forms have rather broad blunt wings, but such are recognized by their long slender labial palpi. In most cases the larvæ are leaf-miners, but others feed upon leaves externally, and usually bear cases of variable form and texture, as in the genus Coleophora. Others are gall-makers, or bore the stems of plants or twigs of trees, or feed on fruit; others are leaf-folders. Many feed on dead animal and vegetable substances, and are of economic importance from their injury to cloth, feathers, stored grain, or dried fruit. The group comprises a number of families, of which the more important are Tineidæ (in a narrow sense), Argyresthiidæ, Hyponomeutidæ, Glyphipterygidæ, Gelechiidæ, Elachistidæ, Gracillariidæ, Lithocolletidæ, Lyonetiidæ, Nepticulidæ, Plutellidæ, and Coleophoridæ. Other forms of the name Tineina are Tineæ, Tinearia, Tineida, Tineidæ (in the broad sense), Tinéides, and Tineites. See cuts under clothes-moth, corn-moth, gall-moth, Gracillaria, Lithocolletis, and Plutella.

tineman† (tīn'man), n. [Appar. equiv. to townman, < tine*, n., town (cf. tinc[1], v.), inclosure, + man.] An officer of the forest in England, who had the nocturnal care of vert and venison.

tine-stock (tīn'stok), n. [< tine[7] + stock[1].] One of the short projecting handles upon the pole of a scythe. See cut under scythe. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

tinet† (tī'net), n. [Cf. tine[1].] Brushwood and thorns for making and repairing hedges. Burrill.

tine-tare (tīn'tār), n. The hairy tare, Vicia hirsuta (see tine[3]); also, sometimes, the earthnut-pea, Lathyrus tuberosus.

Tinewald, n. See Tynwald.

tine-weed (tīn'wēd), n. See tine[3].

tin-floor (tin'flōr), n. In tin-mining, a flat mass of tinstone. See floor, 7, flat[1], 10, and carbona. [Cornwall, Eng.]

tin-foil (tin'foil), n. Thin sheet-metal or thick foil either of pure tin or of an alloy of which tin forms the greater part: used for wrapping up articles, such as drugs and confectionery, which must be kept from moisture or from the air.

tin-foil (tin'foil), v. t. [< tin-foil, n.] To cover with tin-foil; fix tin-foil upon as a coating. The tin-foiling of looking-glasses is commonly called silvering. See silver, v. t., 2.

O Luceo, fortune's gilt
Is rubd quite off from my slight, tin-foild state.
Marston, Antonio and Mellida, II., i. 2.

The glass, . . . after being tinfoiled, is gently and carefully pushed across the table containing the mercury.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LVII. 215.

ting[1] (ting), v. i. and t. [Also tink, and freq. tingle, tinkle; < ME. tingen = MD. tinghen, tinkle; cf. MD. tintelen, ring, tinkle, D. tintelen, tingle, sparkle, L. tinnire, tinkle, ring (see tinnient), LL. tintinnum, a ringing (see tintinnabulum), LL. freq. tinnitare (> F. tinter), ring, tinkle. Cf. chink, clink, ring[2], etc.; also tang[3], ding[2], ding-dong, all ult. imitative words.] To sound or ring tinklingly; tinkle.

For all that might have been.
M. Arnold, Obermann Once More.

tinge (tinj), n. [< tinge, v.] 1. A slight or moderate degree of coloration; a shade or tint of color; a modification of hue, tint, or complexion.

Autumn bold,
With universal tinge of sober gold.
Keats, Endymion, i.

Her skin was fair, with a faint tinge, such as the white rosebud shows before it opens.
O. W. Holmes, Professor, iii.

2. A modifying infusion or intermixture; a shade of some qualifying property or characteristic; a touch, taste, or flavor.

The stories [of the common people of Spain] . . . have generally something of an Oriental tinge.
Irving, Alhambra, p. 188.

tingent (tin'jent), a. [< L. tingen(t-)s, ppr. of tingere, dye, tinge: see tinge.] Having power to tinge; tinting. [Rare.]

As for the white part, it appears much less enriched with the tingent property. Boyle.

tingi, tinguy (ting'gi), n. [Tupi.] A Brazilian forest-tree, Magonia glabrata, of the Sapindaceæ, covering large tracts almost exclusively. Soap is made from its broad flat seeds, and an infusion of the root-bark is used to poison fish.

Tingidæ (tin'ji-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Westwood, 1840), < Tingis + -idæ.] An incorrect form of Tingitidæ.

Tingis (tin'jis), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1803).] 1. A genus of heteropterous insects, typical of and formerly coextensive with the family Tingitidæ, now restricted to forms which have the costal area biseriate, the legs and antennæ not very slender, and the first antennal joint scarcely longer than the second. There are only 8 species, of which 3 are North American.—2. [l. c.] An insect of this genus, or some other member of the Tingitidæ: as, the hawthorn-tingis, Corythuca arcuata.

Hawthorn-tingis (Corythuca arcuata), one of the Tingitidæ, enlarged about ten times.

tingis-fly (tin'jis-flī), n. A bug of the family Tingitidæ, deceptively like some flies.

Tingitidæ (tin-jit'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Westwood, 1840, as Tingidæ), < Tingis + -idæ.] A curious family of heteropterous insects, comprising small and delicate forms which often attract attention by the enormous numbers in which they collect upon the leaves of trees and shrubs, as well as by their strange structure. The wing-covers are very thin, almost transparent, and filled with gauze-like meshes, and, with the sides of the thorax, project widely. Over the head a hood-like process, also full of meshes, often projects; in some forms more simple processes are present, and are modified in different ways. They are all vegetable-feeders, and often damage forest- and shade-trees. The eggs are usually laid along the veins of leaves, and are disguised by a brownish exudation. There are 2 subfamilies, Piesminæ and Tingitinæ, with about 35 genera and 110 species, of most parts of the world. Corythuca is a genus of striking aspect, best represented in the United States.

tin-glass (tin'glȧs), n. 1†. Tin.

This white lead or tinglasse hath been of long time in estimation, . . . as witnesseth the Poet Homer, who calleth it Cassiteron.—This is certein, that two pieces of black lead cannot possibly be sodered together without this tinglasse. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxxiv. 16.

Thy Head into a Tin-man's Shop? Prior, A Simile.

tin-mordant (tin'môr″dant), n. Same as tin-liquor.

tinmouth (tin'mouth), n. A fish: same as crappie. [Local, U. S.]

tinned (tind), p. a. 1. Covered, overlaid, or coated with tin: as, tinned dishes. [Eng.]

Use tinned tacks, as they do not rust.
Paper-hanger, p. 30.

2. Packed or preserved in hermetically sealed tins; canned: as, tinned milk; tinned meats.

We were obliged to lay in a stock of tinned provisions.
Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 467.

Tinned sheet-iron, tin-plate.—Tinned ware, metal-ware protected by tinning: applied especially to early and decorative work as distinguished from tinware.

tinnent† (tin'en), a. [< ME. tinnen, < AS. tinen = OHG. MHG. zinīn (cf. G. zinnern); as tin + -en[2].] Consisting of tin; made of tin.

Thy Tinnen Chariot shod with burning bosses.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 4.

★ tinner (tin'ėr), n. [< tin + -er[1].] 1†. One who works in a tin-mine or tin-works.

All tinners and labourers in and about the stannaries shall, during the time of their working therein bona fide, be privileged from suits of other courts.
Blackstone, Com., III. vi.

2. A tinman or tinsmith.—Tinner's stove, a tinman's stove; a portable stove of sheet-metal at which tinmen and plumbers heat their soldering-tools.

Tinnevelly senna. See senna.

tinnient† (tin'i-ent), a. [< L. tinnien(t-)s, ppr. of tinnire, ring: see ting[1], tink.] Emitting a clear ringing or tinkling sound. Imp. Dict.

tinning (tin'ing), n. [Verbal n. of tin, v.] 1. The art or process of coating metallic surfaces with tin, of making or repairing tinware, or of packing substances in tin cans for preservation. The protection of copper from rusting by tinning was known as early as the time of Pliny; a similar treatment of sheet iron was first mentioned by Agricola.

As you see, sir, I work at tinning. I put new bottoms into old tin tea-pots, and such like.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 302.

2. The layer or coat of tin thus applied.—3†. Tinware.

If your butter, when it is melted, tastes of brass, it is your master's fault, who will not allow you a silver saucepan; besides, . . . new tinning is very chargeable.
Swift, Advice to Servants (Cook).

tinning-metal (tin'ing-met/al), n. Solder, usually composed of equal weights of tin and lead, used by electrotypers for coating (tinning) the backs of copper shells for the reception of the fused backing-metal. The latter is poured into the shells, and, when cooled, is firmly united to them by the tinning-metal.

tinnitus (ti-nī'tus), n. [NL., < L. tinnitus, a ringing, a jingling, < tinnire, pp. tinnitus, ring: see tinnient.] In med., a ringing in the ears. In many cases tinnitus is an unimportant symptom, depending on some local temporary affection of the ear, disorder of the digestive system, or excitement of the cerebral circulation. But it is often of a more serious nature, being a common symptom of organic disease of the auditory nerve, or of inflammation of the middle ear. More fully tinnitus aurium.

tinnock (tin'ok), n. [Cf. pinnock[1].] A titmouse, as Parus cæruleus. [Prov. Eng.]

Tinnunculus (ti-nung'kū-lus), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1807), < L. tinnunculus, a kind of hawk.] A genus of Falconidæ, or subgenus of Falco, containing small falcons such as the kestrel and some sparrow-hawks. It was originally a specific name of the European kestrel, as Falco tinnunculus, now commonly called Tinnunculus alaudarius. The common sparrow-hawk of the United States is T. sparverius. There are several others. Also called Falcula. See second cut under sparrow-hawk.

tinny (tin'i), a. [< tin + -y[1].] Pertaining or relating to tin; containing tin; resembling tin.

> Dart [the river] nigh chockt with sands of tinny mines.
> Spenser, F. Q., IV. xi. 31.
>
> Those arms of sea that thrust into the tinny strand [of Cornwall], > Sportsman's Gazetteer, p. 379.

Tinoceras (tī-nos'e-ras), n. [NL. (O. C. Marsh, 1872), < Gr. τείνειν, stretch (see thin[1]), + κέρας, horn.] 1. A genus of huge fossil mammals from the Eocene of North America, related to Dinoceras. See Dinocerata.—2. [l. c.] An animal of this genus.

tinoceratid (tī-nō-ser'a-tid), a. Belonging or related to, or having the characters of, the genus Tinoceras. Also used substantively.

Tinoporinæ (tī/nō-pō-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Tinoporus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Rotaliidæ, with a test consisting of irregularly heaped chambers, with (or sometimes without) a more or less distinctly spiral primordial portion, and for the most part without any general aperture.

Tinoporus (tī-nop'ō-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. τείνειν, stretch (see thin[1]), + πόρος, a pore.] The name-giving genus of Tinoporinæ. W. B. Carpenter.

Tinospora (tī-nos'pō-rä), n. [NL. (Miers, 1851), < L. tinus (old name of the laurustinus, q. v.) + Gr. σπορά, a seed.] A genus of plants, of the family Menispermaceæ, type of the tribe Tinosporeæ. It is characterized by flowers with six sepals and as many petals, and by free stamens with their anther-cells lateral and distinct. The 20 species are natives of tropical Asia, Africa, and Australasia. Their flowers are borne in long and slender unbranched racemes, followed by ovoid drupes. See gulancha.

Tinosporeæ (tī-nō-spō'rē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Hooker and Thomson, 1855), < Tinospora + -eæ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, of the family Menispermaceæ, characterized by flowers usually with three carpels, drupaceous in fruit, and containing a meniscoid albuminous seed with the cotyledons laterally divaricate. It includes 27 genera.

tin-penny (tin'pen/i), n. A customary duty formerly paid to tithingmen for liberty to dig in the English tin-mines.

tin-pint (tin'pīnt), n. A pint measure. [Bay of Fundy.]

tin-plate (tin'plāt'), n. Sheet-iron or -steel coated with tin. It is an important article of manufacture, especially in Great Britain and the United States, where it is used in a great variety of ways, especially for kitchen utensils, and for cans (called tins for brevity) for preserving meat, vegetables, and fruit by keeping them in an air-tight condition. The use of the tin is to prevent the iron from rusting, tin being a metal which is not perceptibly corroded by air or weak acids. The manufacture of tin-plate of good quality requires great skill and a superior quality of iron. For the best quality of tin-plate the iron was refined with the use of charcoal alone; such iron was called charcoal-plate. Plate made from puddled iron is generally known as coke-plate. The processes of preparing the iron or steel and coating the surface with tin vary somewhat in different manufactories, but the essential features are that the plates shall be properly cleaned by chemical and mechanical means, shall be toughened by rolling between polished rollers, annealed, cleaned again, and finally coated with tin by a somewhat complicated series of operations. In the very best kind of tin-plate the coating of tin was made of extra thickness, and the surface worked over with a polished hammer on a polished anvil. An important improvement in the manufacture of tin-plate came into general use in England between 1860 and 1866. It consisted in passing the sheets, after they had received the final coating of tin, between steel rollers. "The object of this process, which is by far the most important improvement of modern times, is to spread or equalize the metal over the surface of the sheet" (Flower).—Crystallized tin-plate, tin-plate on whose surface the crystalline structure of the metal is developed by treatment with a mixture of dilute nitric and sulphuric acids.

tinplate (tin'plāt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. tinplated, ppr. tinplating. [< tin-plate, n.] To plate or coat with tin. The Engineer, LXIX. 496.

tin-pot (tin'pot), n. In the manufacture of tin-plate as at present carried on in England, the pot, filled with molten tin, in which the sheet of iron receives its first coating of tin, immediately after being taken out of the palm-oil bath.

> From the palm-oil bath, by means of tongs, the sheets are passed by the tinman, who has charge of both pots, to the tin pot, which is full of molten tin, and here they remain to soak for a period of 20 minutes, the tinman constantly, by means of his tongs, opening and re-opening the pack (which is always beneath the metal), with the object of enabling the melted tin to get at every part of the surface. Flower, A Hist. of the Trade in Tin, p. 170.

tin-pulp (tin'pulp), n. A dyeing material, consisting of the precipitate obtained from a solution of protochlorid (muriate) or bichlorid of tin and yellow prussiate of potash. Also called prussiate of tin.

> The so-called prussiate of tin, or tin-pulp, is chiefly used as an ingredient in printing steam-blues on cotton.
> W. Crookes, Dyeing and Calico-Printing, p. 166.

tin-putty (tin'put/i), n. Same as putty-powder. Ure, Dict., III. 220.

tin-saw (tin'sâ), n. A kind of saw used by bricklayers for sawing kerfs in bricks, to facilitate dressing them with the ax to the shape required.

tin-scrap (tin'skrap), n. The waste of tin-plate left from the manufacture of tinware. The proportion of this is large, and it is worked up into many small articles, or treated metallurgically for the recovery of the iron and tin contained in it.

tinse (tins), v. t.; pret. and pp. tinsed, ppr. tinsing. [Appar. a back-formation from tinsel[2], tinsey.] To cover (a child's ball) with worsted of various colors. [Prov. Eng.]

tinsel[1] (tin'sel), n. [< ME. tinsel, tinsale, tinsill, loss, < tine, lose (see tine[2]), + -sel, a formative seen in G. wechsel, schicksal, etc.] Loss; forfeiture. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

> Boith the wynning and tinsaill
> Off your haill Regioun and ryng.
> Lauder, Dewtie of Kyngis (E. E. T. S.), l. 382.

Tinsel of superiority, a remedy introduced by statute for unentered vassals whose superiors are themselves unfeft, and therefore cannot effectually enter them.—Tinsel of the feu, in Scots law, the loss or forfeiture of a feu-right by failure to pay the feu-duty for two years whole and together.

tinsel[2] (tin'sel), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also tinsell, tinsil, tinsille (also tinsey); by apheresis from etincelle*, < OF. estincelle, F. étincelle, spark, sparkle, twinkle, flash, earlier escintelle* (?), < L. scintilla, spark, flash: see scintilla.] I. n. 1. Some glittering metallic substance, as burnished brass, copper, or tin, made in sheets approaching the thinness of foil, and used in pieces, strips, or threads for any purpose in which a sparkling effect is desired without much cost. Gold and silver tinsel, round or flat, made of Dutch metal, is much employed in the manufacture of artificial flies.

> Shelley, Queen Mab, v.

2. A fabric or some material for dress overlaid or shot with glittering metallic sparkles or threads. The name has been given to cloth of silk interwoven with gold or silver threads.

> Skirts, round underborne with a bluish tinsel.
> Shak., Much Ado, iii. 4. 22.
>
> It will abide no more test than the tinsel
> We clad our masques in for an hour's wearing.
> Fletcher and Rowley, Maid in the Mill, ii. 2.

3. Figuratively, glistening or gaudy show; superficial glitter or sparkle; garish pretense.

> There is a dangerous tinsel in false taste, by which the unwary mind and young imagination are often fascinated.
> Goldsmith, Taste.

II. a. Consisting of, or characteristic of, tinsel; hence, gaudy; showy to excess; speciously glittering.

> Tinsel affections make a glorious glistering.
> Fletcher, Loyal Subject, iii. 3.
>
> Light coin, the tinsel clink of compliment.
> Tennyson, Princess, ii.

★ tinsel[2] (tin'sel), v. t.; pret. and pp. tinseled, tinselled, ppr. tinseling, tinselling. [< tinsel[2], n.] To adorn with tinsel; hence, to adorn with anything showy and glittering.

> Figured satin, tinselled and overcast with golden threads. Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, i. 56.
>
> She, tinsell'd o'er in robes of varying hues,
> With self-applause her wild creation views.
> Pope, Dunciad, i. 81.

tinsel-embroidery (tin'sel-em-broi/dèr-i), n. Embroidery on openwork or thin material with narrow tinsel, which is put on with the needle like yarn, and is used as gold thread is in embroidery of a higher class.

tinseling, tinselling (tin'sel-ing), n. [Verbal n. of tinsel[2], v.] In ceram., a process by which the surface of a piece of pottery is made to appear metallic in parts by washing with a species of metallic luster.

tinselly (tin'sel-i), a. [< tinsel[2] + -ly[1].] Resembling tinsel; gaudy; showy and superficial. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

tinselly (tin'sel-i), adv. [< tinsel[2] + -ly[2].] In a gaudy and superficial manner. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

tinselry (tin'sel-ri), n. [< tinsel[2] + -(e)ry.] Glittering or tawdry material; that with which a gaudy show is made, or the show itself. [Rare.]

> We found the bats flying about in the arches above and behind the altar, and priests and boys firing guns at them, among the poor tinselry of the worship, with results more damaging to "bell, book, and candle" than birds.
> S. Bowles, Our New West, xxvii.

tinsen† (tin'sn), n. Same as tinsel[2].

tinsey† (tin'si), a. [A var. of tinsel[2], simulating an adj. term. -ly; cf. tinselly.] Same as tinsel[2].

> The mock finery of the actors, who were "Strutting round their Balconies in their Tinsey Robes."
> Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [I. 250.

tin-shop (tin'shop), n. A shop or establishment where tinware is made and repaired.

tinsman (tinz'man), n.; pl. tinsmen (-men). A tinsmith. Elect. Rev. (Amer.), XVIII. 23. [Rare.]

tinsmith (tin'smith), n. A worker in tin-plate; a maker of tinware.

tinsmithing (tin'smith-ing), n. The work or trade of a tinsmith; the making of tinware.

tinstone (tin'stōn), n. The miners' name for tin dioxid, the principal ore of tin; the cassiterite of the mineralogist.

tin-streaming (tin'strē/ming), n. See streaming, 1. F. Pollock, Land Laws, p. 50.

tin-stuff (tin'stuf), n. Tin ore with its gangue as it comes from the mine.

tint[1] (tint), n. [A reduction of tinct, or an accom. of teint (an obs. form of taint[1]), < F. teint, teinte = Pr. tenta, tent = Sp. tinta, tinte = Pg. tinta = It. tinta, tinto, dye, tint; or else directly < It. tinta, tinto, < L. tinctus, dye, hue: see tinct, taint[1].] 1. A variety of a color, especially and properly a luminous variety of low chroma; also, abstractly, the respect in which a color may be varied by more or less admixture of white light, which at once increases the luminosity and diminishes the chroma. In painting, tints are the colors, considered as more or less bright, deep, or thin, by the due use and combination of which a picture receives its shades, softness, and variety.

> Though dim as yet in tint and line,
> We trace Thy picture's wise design.
> Whittier, Thy Will be Done.

2. In engraving, a series of parallel lines cut upon a wood block with a tint-tool, so as to produce an even and uniform shading, as in clear skies.—Aërial tints. See aërial.—Aqueous tint. See aqueous.—Crossed tint. See tint-block.—Flat tint, color of uniform tint, not shaded. In decorative art flat tints are placed in juxtaposition, without being blended.—Rubbed tints. See rub.—Ruled tint. See tint-block.—Safety tint, a distinctive tint given to bank-notes, drafts, bonds, etc., as a security against counterfeiting.—Secondary tints. See secondary.—Tint with high lights. See tint-block.

tint[1] (tint), v. t. [< tint[1], n.] To apply a tint or tints to; color in a special manner; tinge.

> Be thou the rainbow to the storms of life!
> The evening beam that smiles the clouds away,
> And tints to-morrow with prophetic ray!
> Byron, Bride of Abydos, ii. 20.

Tinted paper, paper having a more or less light uniform shade of some color, imparted to it either in the process of manufacture or by subsequent treatment.

tint[2] (tint). A Scotch preterit of tine[2].

tintage (tin'tāj), n. [< tint[1] + -age.] The coloring or shading of anything; state or condition as to color. [Rare.]

> The unvarying tintage, all shining greens and hazy blues. Livingstone's Life Work, p. 375.

tintamar†, tintamarre† (tin-ta-mär'), n. [< F. tintamarre (= Wall. titamar), a confused noise; origin obscure.] A confused noise; an uproar.

Nor is there any Motion or the least tintamar of Trouble in any Part of the Country, which is rare in France. Howell, Letters, I. i. 19.

tint-block (tint'blok), n. In printing, a surface of wood or metal prepared for printing typographically the background or ground-tint of a page or an illustration in two or more colors. A ruled tint has faint and close parallel white lines on its surface. A crossed tint has lines crossing one another. A tint with high lights has bits or patches of white cut out in the places where glints of white are needed to give effect to the engraving. Tinted printing-surfaces are oftenest made by engraving by hand or by a ruling-machine. The appearance of flat surfaces of cloth, smooth wood, marble, or grained leather is often produced by pressing the material selected upon a heated plate of soft metal.

tint-drawing (tint'drâ″ing), n. The drawing of objects or surfaces in water-color or a wash of uniform tint, or of varying shades of the same tint, as the subject may require.

tinter (tin'tėr), n. [< tint[1] + -er[1].] 1. A person who tints, or an instrument for tinting.—2. A slide of plain colored glass, as pink or blue, used with the magic lantern to give moonlight or sunrise effects, or the like, to pictures from plain or uncolored slides.

tinternell†, n. [Cf. OF. tinton, a kind of dance, the burden of a song, the ting of a bell, < tinter, ring: see ting.] A certain old dance. Halliwell.

tintiness (tin'ti-nes), n. The state or condition of being tinty.

What painters call tintiness when they observe that the brilliancy of local tints severally affects their harmony and the tertiaries are weak. Athenæum, No. 3073, p. 377.

tinting (tin'ting), n. [Verbal n. of tint[1], v.] In line-engraving, the method or act of producing an even and uniform shading by cutting a series of parallel lines on the plate or block.

tintinnabula, n. Plural of tintinnabulum.

tintinnabulant (tin-ti-nab'ū-lant), a. [< L. tintinnabulum, a bell (see tintinnabulum), + -ant.] Same as tintinnabular. [Rare.]

Frappant and tintinnabulant appendages [knockers and bells]. H. Smith, Rejected Addresses, x.

tintinnabular (tin-ti-nab'ū-lär), a. [< L. tintinnabulum, a bell, + -ar[3].] Of or relating to bells or their sound.

tintinnabulary (tin-ti-nab'ū-lā-ri), a. Same as tintinnabular. Bulwer, Pelham, xxv. [Rare.]

tintinnabulation (tin-ti-nab-ū-lā'shon), n. [< L. tintinnabulum, a bell, + -ation.] The ringing of a bell or of bells; a sound like that of ringing bells.

The tintinnabulation that so musically wells
From the bells, . . .
From the jingling and the tinkling of the bells.
Poe, The Bells.

tintinnabulous (tin-ti-nab'ū-lus), a. [< L. tintinnabulum, a bell, + -ous.] Given to or characterized by the ringing of a bell, or the making of bell-like sounds.

I, and many others who suffered much from his [the college porter's] tintinnabulous propensities, . . . have forgiven him. De Quincey, Opium Eater, p. 84.

tintinnabulum (tin-ti-nab'ū-lum), n.; pl. tintinnabula (-lä). [< L. tintinnabulum, a bell (cf. ML. tintinnum, OF. tantan, a cow-bell), < tintinnare, ring, clink, jangle, redupl. of tinnire, tinire, ring, tinkle: see tinnient, ting[1].] 1. A bell; specifically, a grelot: especially applied to such an object of antique Roman origin.—2. A rattle formed of small bells or small plates of metal.

Tintinnidæ (tin-tin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tintinnus + -idæ.] A family of heterotrichous (formerly supposed to be peritrichous) ciliate infusorians, typified by the genus Tintinnus. These animalcules are free-swimming or sedentary, and mostly inhabit a lorica, or indurated sheath, to the bottom or side of which the ovate or pyriform body is attached by a retractile pedicle or filament from the posterior end of the body. The mouth is eccentric, terminal or nearly so, with circular peristome fringed with large cirrate cilia. The general cuticular surface is more or less completely clothed with fine vibratile cilia. Genera besides the type are Tintinnidium, Codonella, and Tintinnopsis. Usually written Tintinnodæ.

Tintinnus (tin-tin'us), n. [NL. (Schrank, 1803), < L. tintinnare, ring: see tintinnabulum.] The typical genus of Tintinnidæ, containing free loricate forms adherent by a retractile pedicle. These animalcules are all marine, and under the microscope display great agility. There are many species, such as T. inquilinus.

tintless (tint'les), a. [< tint[1] + -less.] Having no tint; colorless. Charlotte Brontë, Villette, xii.

tintometer (tin-tom'e-tėr), n. [< tint[1] + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An instrument or apparatus for determining tints or shades of color by comparison with standard tints or shades. Lovibond's, one of the more recent and improved instruments, consists of a combination of standard colored glasses so arranged that all side light is cut off. The tint to be determined is compared with the different tints obtained by these combinations until one is found which it matches.

tint-tool (tint'tōl), n. In wood-engraving, an implement used to cut parallel lines on a block, so as to produce a tint. It has a handle like that of the burin, but the blade is thinner at the back, and deeper, and the point-angle is much more acute. See cut under graver.

tinty (tin'ti), a. [< tint[1] + -y[1].] Exhibiting discordant diversity or contrast of tints; inharmoniously tinted or colored, as a painting. Athenæum, Feb. 4, 1888, p. 153.

tintype (tin'tīp), n. A photographic positive taken on a thin plate of japanned iron; a ferrotype.

tinware (tin'wār), n. Wares of tin; articles, especially vessels for holding liquids, made of tin-plate.

tin-witts (tin'wits), n. pl. Dressed tin ore containing so much pyrites, arsenic, or other deleterious ingredients that it must be roasted or calcined in a reverberatory furnace, or in a specially contrived calciner, before being passed through the processes of jigging, tossing, dilluing, etc. [Cornwall, Eng.]

tin-works (tin'wėrks), n. sing. and pl. Works or an establishment for the mining or manufacture of tin, or for the making of tinware.

tin-worm† (tin'wėrm), n. A small red worm, round, and having many legs, much like a hog-louse. Bailey, 1731.

tiny (tī'ni or tin'i), a. [Also teeny (common in childish use); formerly also tinny, tyny; first in the phrase little tiny, earlier little tine, ME. litel tyne, used as a single adj., an emphatic form of little, but also, and appar. earlier, with tyne, a noun, a litel tyne meaning 'a little bit,' that is, 'a little time' or 'a little space.' The origin of this tyne is undetermined. The word becoming tine, tiny was fixed in an adj. use conformed to adjectives in -y, esp. pretty, which was often used with little ('little pretty' and later 'pretty little').] Very diminutive; minute; wee. It is frequently used with little as an intensification of its force: as, a little tiny boy; a tiny little piece of something.

Sec. Pas. Haylle, lytylle tyne mop! rewarder of mede! . . .
Haylle, lytylle mylk sop! haylle, David sede!
Towneley Mysteries, p. 96.

When that I was and a little tine boy,
With hey, ho, the wind and the rain.
Shak., T. N., v. 1. 398 (fol. 1623).

All that heard a little tinny page,
By his ladyes coach as he ran.
Little Musgrave and Lady Barnard (Child's Ballads, II. 17).

But Annie from her baby's forehead clipt
A tiny curl, and gave it. Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

Tiny perches, the elassomes.

-tion. [ME. -tion, -cion, -cioun, -ciun, < OF. -tion, -cion, -ciun, also -çon, -son, -sun, F -tion, -çon = Sp. -ción = Pg. -cão = It. -zione = D. -tie = G. -tion, < L. -tio(n-), a suffix of abstract nouns (many used as concrete), as in dic-tio(n-), saying, < dic-ere, say, accusa-tio(n-), accusation, < accusa-re, accuse, moni-tio(n-), warning, < mone-re, warn, audi-tio(n-), hearing, < audi-re, hear (see the corresponding E. words).] A suffix occurring in many abstract (and concrete) nouns of Latin origin. It appears, according to the Latin original, either without a preceding vowel, as in diction, action, reception, etc., or with a preceding vowel, as in accusation, monition, audition, etc., the vowel being often, however, radical, as in station, completion, ambition, motion, ablution, revolution, etc. Preceded by -a-, the suffix has become a common English formative (see -ation). The suffix -tion after a radical s- in the Latin stem appears as -sion, as in mission, passion, etc. In words derived through the Old French it also appears as -son, as in benison, malison, mension, venison, etc.

-tious. [ME. -tious, -cious, etc., < OF. -cios, -cious, -cieux, -tieux, F. -tieux = Sp. Pg. -cioso = It. -zioso, < L. -tiosus, being the suffix -osus (> E. -ous, -ose) added to stems in -t-: see -ous.
